In a few days, the wind blowing in a northern direction, they steered again towards the French coast, and ran in with the land near Havre de Grace, where the flat-bottomed boats provided for landing were hoisted out, and a second disembarkation expected. But the wind blowing violently towards the evening, the boats were again hauled on board, and the fleet obliged to quit the land, in order to avoid the dangers of a lee shore. Next day the weather being more moderate, they returned to the same station, and orders were given to prepare for a descent; but the duke of Marlborough having taken a view of the coast in an open cutter, accompanied by commodore Howe, thought proper to wave the attempt.

Their next step was to bear away before the wind for Cherbourg, in the neighbourhood of which place the fleet came to anchor. Here some of the transports were saluted by the fire of six different batteries, and a considerable body of troops appeared in arms to oppose the landing: nevertheless, the general determined that the forts Querqueville and Gallet should be attacked in the night by the first regiment of guards. The soldiers were actually distributed in the flat-bottomed boats, and every preparation made for this purpose, when the wind began to blow with such violence, that the troops could not be landed without the most imminent danger; nor properly sustained, in case of a repulse, even if the disembarkation could have been effected.

This attempt was therefore abandoned; but at the same time a resolution taken to stand in towards the shore with the whole fleet, to cover a general landing. A disposition was made accordingly; but the storm increasing, the transports ran foul of each other, and the ships were exposed to all the perils of a lee shore; for the gale blew directly upon the coast: besides, the provisions began to fail, and the hay for the horses was almost exhausted. These concurring reasons induced the commanders to defer the disembarkation to a more favourable opportunity. The fleet stood out to sea, the tempest abated; they steered for the Isle of Wight, and next day anchored at St. Helen's.

Such was the issue of an enterprize, which, tho' it did not answer the expectations of the public, was yet productive of infinite damage to the enemy; for the loss they sustained by the conflagration at St. Malo is said to have amounted to twenty-four millions of livres.

The designs upon the coast of France, though interrupted by tempestuous weather, were not as yet laid aside for the whole season: but, in the mean time, the troops were disembarked on the Isle of Wight, and one brigade marched to the northward, to join a body of troops with which the government resolved to reinforce the army of the allies in Germany, commanded by prince Ferdinand of Brunswic. The duke of Marlborough and lord George Sackville being appointed to conduct this British corps upon the continent, the command of the marine expeditions devolved upon lieutenant-general Bligh, an old experienced officer who had served with reputation; and his royal highness prince Edward, afterwards created duke of York, entered as a volunteer with commodore Howe, in order to learn the rudiments of the sea-service.

The remainder of the troops being reembarked, and every thing prepared for the second expedition, the fleet sailed from St. Helen's on the first of August; and, after a tedious passage from calms and contrary winds, arrived on the seventh in the bay of Cherbourg. By this time the enemy had intrenched themselves within a line, extending from the fort of Ecoeurdeville, which stands about two miles to the westward of Cherbourg, along the coast for the space of four miles, fortified with several batteries at proper distances. Behind this retrenchment a large body of regular troops, reinforced by militia, appeared in good order; but as they did not advance to the open beach, the less risque was run in landing the British forces.

At first a bomb-ketch had been sent to anchor near the town and throw some shells into the place; as a feint to amuse the enemy, and deceive them with regard to the place of disembarkation; while the general had determined to land about a league to the westward of Querqueville, the most western fort in the bay. The other bomb ketches being posted along shore, did considerable execution upon the intrenchments, not only by throwing shells in the usual way, but also by using ball-mortars, filled with great quantities of balls, which may be thrown to a great distance, and, by scattering as they fly, do abundance of mischief.

While these ketches maintained a continual fire, the grenadiers and guards were conveyed regularly ashore in the flat-bottomed boats; and landing without opposition, instantly drew up in a small open part of the beach, with a natural breastwork in their front, having on one side a hollow way, and a village rising beyond it with a sudden ascent: on the other, the ground was intersected by hedges and covered with orchards; and from this quarter the enemy advanced in order. The British troops immediately quitted the breastwork, in order to meet them half way, and a straggling fire began; but the French edging to the left, took possession of the hill, from whence they piquered with the advanced posts of the English.

In the mean time the rest of the infantry were disembarked, and the enemy at night retreated. As the light troops were not yet landed, general Bligh encamped that night at the village of Erville, on a piece of ground that did not extend four hundred paces, so that the tents were crowded together in a confused and irregular manner. Next morning, the general being informed that no parties of the enemy were seen moving on the hill or in the plain, and that fort Querqueville was entirely deserted, made a disposition for marching to Cherbourg. An advanced party took immediate possession of Querqueville, and the lines and batteries along the shore were now abandoned by the enemy.

The British forces marching behind St. Aulne, Ecoeurdeville, Hommet, and la Gallet, found Cherbourg likewise undefended, and the gates being open, entered it without opposition. The citizens, encouraged by a promise of protection, received their new guests with a profusion of civilities; notwithstanding which the soldiers indulged themselves in some irregularities; but these were no sooner discovered than the offenders were brought to condign punishment, and the army kept to the most strict discipline. Next morning the place being surveyed, the general determined to destroy the forts and the bason; and the execution of this design was left to the engineers, assisted by the officers of the fleet and artillery.

Great sums of money had been expended upon the harbour and bason of Cherbourg, which at one time was considered by the French court as an object of great importance, from its situation respecting the river Seine, as well as the opposite coast of England; but as the works were left unfinished, in all probability the plan had grown into disrepute. The enemy had raised several unconnected batteries along the bay, but the town itself was quite open and defenceless. While the engineers were employed in demolishing the works, the light horse scoured the country, and detachments were every day sent out towards Walloign, at the distance of four leagues from Cherbourg, where the enemy were encamped, and every hour received reinforcements. Several skirmishes were fought by the out-parties of each army; in one of which captain Lindsay, a gallant young officer, who had a considerable share in training the light horse, was mortally wounded.

The harbour and bason of Cherbourg being destroyed, together with all the forts in the neighbourhood, and about twenty pieces of brass cannon conveyed on board the English ships, a contribution, amounting to about three thousand pounds sterling, was exacted from the town, and a plan of reimbarkation concerted, as it appeared, from the reports of peasants and deserters, that the enemy were already increased to a formidable number. A slight intrenchment being raised, sufficient to defend the last division that should be reimbarked, the stores and artillery were shipped, and the light horse immediately carried on board their respective transports, by means of platforms laid in the flat-bottomed vessels. On the sixteenth day of August, at three o'clock in the morning, the forces marched from Cherbourg down to the beach, and reimbarked at Fort Gallet, without the least disturbance from the enemy.

This service being happily performed, the fleet set sail for the coast of England, and anchored in the road of Weymouth, under the high land of Portland. In two days it weighed and stood again to the southward, but was obliged by contrary winds to return to the same station. The second effort, however, was more successful. The fleet with some difficulty kept the sea; and steering to the French coast, arrived in the bay of St. Lunaire, two leagues to the westward of St. Malo, upon which it was determined to make another attempt. The sloops and ketches being posted along-shore to cover the landing, the troops were debarked on a fair open beach, and a small party detached to the harbour of St. Briac, above the town of St. Malo, where they destroyed about fifteen small vessels: but St. Malo itself being carefully reconnoitred, appeared to be impregnable either by the land-forces or the shipping.

The mouth of the river that forms its bason extends above two miles in breadth at its narrowest part, so as to be out of the reach of land-batteries; and the entrance is defended by such forts and batteries as the ships of war could not pretend to silence, considering the difficult navigation of the channel: besides fifty pieces of large cannon planted on these forts and batteries, the enemy had mounted forty on the west side of the town; and the bason was, moreover, strengthened by seven frigates or armed vessels, whose guns might have been brought to bear upon any batteries that could be raised on shore, as well as upon ships entering by the usual channel.

For these reasons the design against St. Malo was relinquished; but the general being unwilling to reimbark without having taken some step for the further annoyance of the enemy, determined to penetrate into the country, regulating his motions, however, by those of the fleet, which had by this time quitted the bay of St. Lunaire, where it could not ride with any safety, and anchored in the bay of St. Cas, about three leagues to the westward.

On the eighth of September general Bligh with his little army began his march for Guildo, at the distance of nine miles, which he reached in the evening. Next day he passed a little gut or inlet of the sea, at low water; and his troops being harrassed by the peasants, who fired at him from hedges and houses, he sent a priest with a message, importing, that if they would not desist he would reduce their houses to ashes. No regard being paid to this intimation, the houses were actually set on fire as soon as the troops had formed their camp, about two miles on the other side of the inlet. Next morning he advanced to the village of Matignon, where, after some irregular firing, the French piquets appeared, drawn up in order, to the number of two battalions; but having stood a few discharges of the English field-pieces, and seeing the grenadiers approach, they suddenly dispersed.

General Bligh continuing his route through the village, encamped in the open ground about three miles from the bay of St. Cas, which was this day reconnoitred for reimbarkation; for he now received certain intelligence that the duke d'Aiguillon had advanced from Brest to Lambale, within six miles of the English camp, at the head of twelve regular battalions, six squadrons, two regiments of militia, militia, eight mortars, and ten pieces of cannon. The bay of St. Cas was covered by an intrenchment which the enemy had thrown up, the more effectually to prevent any disembarkation; and on the outside of this work there was a range of sand hills extending along shore, which could have served as a cover to the enemy, from whence they might have annoyed the troops in reembarking. For this reason a proposal was made, that the forces should be reembarked from a fair open beach on the left, between St. Cas and Guil-do; but this advice was rejected, and indeed the subsequent operations of the army seem to have been conducted with little prudence or discretion.

Had the troops decamped in the night, without noise, in all probability they would have arrived at the beach before the French had received the least intelligence of their motion; and in that case the whole army, amounting to about six thousand five hundred men, might have been reembarked without interruption: but instead of this cautious manner of proceeding, the drums were beaten at two o'clock in the morning, which could not fail to betray their intention to the enemy. The troops were in motion before three; and though the length of the march did not exceed three miles, the halts and interruptions were so numerous and frequent, that they did not arrive on the beach at St. Cas till nine. Then the embarkation was begun, and might have been happily accomplished, had the transports lain near the shore and received the men as fast as the boats could have conveyed them on board without distinction; but many ships rode at a considerable distance, and every boat carried the men on board the respective transports to which they belonged; a punctilio of disposition which in cases of emergency, ought never to be regarded. The small ships and bomb-ketches were brought near the shore to cover the reembarkation; and a considerable number of sea-officers were stationed on the beach to superintend the boats crews, and regulate the service; but notwithstanding all their attention, some of the boats were employed in carrying off horses and cows, and other booty. Had all the cutters and small craft belonging to the fleet been properly occupied in the service, the disgrace and disaster of the day would in a great measure have been prevented.

The British forces had skirmished a little on their march, but no considerable body of the enemy appeared until the embarkation was begun; then they took possession of an eminence by a wind-mill, and forthwith opened a battery of ten cannon and eight mortars, from whence they fired with considerable effect upon the soldiers on the beach, and on the boats in their passage. They afterwards began to march down the hill, partly covered by a hollow way on their left, with design to gain a wood, where they might form and extend themselves along the front of the English, and advance against them under shelter of the sand-hills; but in their descent they suffered extremely from the cannon and mortars of the shipping, which made great havoc, and threw them into confusion. Their line of march down the hill was broken, and for some time continued in disorder; then they turned off to one side, extended themselves along a hill to their left, and advanced in a hollow way, from whence they suddenly rushed out to the attack.

Though the greater part of the British troops were already embarked, the rear-guard, consisting of all the grenadiers, and half of the first regiment of guards, remained on the shore, to the number of fifteen hundred, under the command of major-general Drury. This officer seeing the enemy advance, ordered his troops to form in grand divisions, and march from behind the bank that covered them, in order to attack the enemy before they could be formed on the plain. This step of Mr. Drury's has been generally condemned as rash and imprudent; for had he kept behind the breast-work, he might either have defended himself till he could have been taken on board; or he might have retreated along the beach to a rock on the left, in which progress his right flank would have been secured by the intrenchment; and the enemy could not have pursued him along the shore without being exposed to such a fire from the shipping as, in all probability, they could not have withstood.

The English line being drawn up in uneven ground, began the action with an irregular fire from right to left, which the enemy returned; but their usual fortitude and resolution seemed to forsake them on this occasion. They saw themselves in danger of being surrounded and cut in pieces; their officers dropped on every side; and all hope of retreat was now intercepted. In this cruel dilemma their spirits failed; they were seized with a panic; they faltered, they broke; and in less than five minutes after the engagement began, they fled in the utmost confusion, pursued by the enemy, who no sooner saw them give way than they fell in among them with their bayonets fixed, and made a terrible havoc. General Drury being dangerously wounded, ran into the sea, where he perished; and this was the fate of a great number, officers as well as soldiers. Many swam towards the boats and vessels, which were ordered to give them all manner of assistance; but by far the greater number were either butchered on the beach or drowned in the water; a small body, however, instead of throwing themselves into the sea, retired to the rock on the left, where they made a stand, until they had exhausted all their ammunition, and then surrendered at discretion. The carnage was moreover increased by the shot and shells discharged from the battery which the enemy had raised on the hill: yet the slaughter would not have been so great, had not the French soldiers been exasperated by the fire from the frigates, which, through the general confusion that then prevailed, was still maintained, even after the English troops were routed: but this was no sooner silenced by a signal from the commodore, than the enemy granted quarter to the vanquished. About one thousand chosen men of the English army were killed and taken prisoners on this occasion; though the loss of the enemy is said to have amounted to double the number.

This affair elated the French, and dispirited the English, much more than could reasonably be expected from a matter of so little consequence. It was in fact no more than the cutting off a rear-guard. There was often more blood shed in some of the skirmishes in Germany, which were never thought worthy of a place in the Gazettes. So far from complaining of our bad fortune, we ought rather to think ourselves extremely fortunate, that we

we were able to land three times on the coast of France without suffering any other or more considerable loss. The French ministry indeed had reason to magnify our defeat, and this they did in a most extravagant manner: but some such cordial was absolutely necessary to console their people, who were filled with chagrin at the utter ruin which had seized their trade, and the disgrace and calamities which had been brought upon their country.

After the action of St. Cas, some civilities by message passed between the duke d'Aiguillon and the English commanders, who were favoured with a list of the prisoners, including four sea-captains; and assured that the wounded should receive all possible comfort and assistance. These matters being adjusted, commodore Howe returned with the fleet to Spithead, and the soldiers were disembarked.

No further attempts were made upon the French coast during the remainder of this season. The English cruizers, however, still continued active and alert. Captain Hervey, in the ship Monmouth, destroyed a French ship of forty guns in the island of Malta; an exploit of which the Maltese loudly complained as a violation of their neutrality. About twenty sail of small French vessels were driven ashore on the rocks of Bretagne by some cruizers belonging to the fleet commanded by lord Anson, after a smart engagement with two frigates, under whose convoy they sailed.

In the month of November the Belliqueux, a French ship of war mounted with sixty-four guns, having by mistake run up St. George's Channel, and anchored in Lundy road, captain Saumarez, of the Antelope, then lying in King's Road, immediately weighed and went in quest of her, according to the advice he had received. When he appeared, the French captain heaved up his anchor and made a shew of resistance; but soon hauled down his colours, and, without firing a shot, surrendered, with a compliment of four hundred and seventeen men, to a ship of inferior force, both in number of hands and weight of metal.

By this time the English privateers swarmed to such a degree in the Channel, that scarce a French vessel durst leave their harbours, and consequently there was little or no booty to be got. In this scarcity of legal prizes, some of the adventurers were tempted to commit acts of piracy, and actually plundered the ships of neutral nations. A Dutch vessel, having on board the baggage and domestics belonging to the marquis de Pignatelli, ambassador from the court of Spain to the king of Denmark, was boarded three times successively by the crews of three different privateers, who forced the hatches, rummaged the hold, broke open and rifled the trunks and boxes of the ambassador, and committed many other acts of violence. Complaints of these outrages being made to the court of London, the lords of the admiralty promised, in the Gazette, a reward of five hundred pounds, without deduction, to any person who should discover the offenders concerned in these acts of piracy. Some of them were detected accordingly, and brought to condign punishment.

The Dutch had for some time carried on a very considerable traffick, not only in taking the fair advantages of the neutrality, but also in supplying the French with naval stores, and transporting the produce of the French sugar colonies to Europe, as carriers hired by the proprietors. The English government, incensed at this unfair commerce, prosecuted with such flagrant partiality for their enemies, issued orders for the cruizers to arrest all ships of neutral powers that should have French property on board; in consequence of which orders, several Dutch ships were taken, and condemned as legal prizes, both in England and Jamaica.

The subjects of the United Provinces raised a loud clamour against the English for having thus, as they said, violated the laws of nations, and the particular treaty of commerce subsisting between Great Britain and the republic. Remonstrances were made to the English ministry, who expostulated in their turn with the deputies of the States-general; and the two nations were inflamed against each other with the most bitter animosity.

The British resident at the Hague, in a conference with the States, represented that the king his master could not hope to see peace speedily restored, if neutral princes should assume a right of carrying on the trade of his enemies: that he expected, from their known justice, and the alliance by which they were so nearly connected with his subjects, they would honestly abandon this fraudulent commerce, and agree that naval stores should be comprehended in the class of contraband commodities. He answered some articles of the complaints they had made with great candour and moderation; declared his majesty's abhorrence of the violences which had been committed upon the subjects of the United Provinces; explained the steps which had been taken by the English government to bring the offenders to justice, as well as to prevent such outrages for the future; and assured them, that his Britannic majesty had nothing more at heart than to renew, and maintain in full force, the mutual confidence and friendship by which the maritime powers of England and Holland had been so long united.

These professions of esteem and affection were not sufficient to allay the apprehensions of the Dutch merchants; and the French party, which was both numerous and powerful, employed all their artifice and address in exasperating their passions, and widening the breach between the two nations. The court of Versailles did not fail to lay hold of such a favourable opportunity: while, on one hand, their ministers and emissaries in Holland exaggerated the indignities and injuries which the States had suffered from the proceedings of the English; they, on the other hand, flattered and cajoled them with little advantages in trade, and formal professions of friendship.

The spirit of the Dutch merchants at this juncture, and their sentiments with respect to England, may be learned from a memorial to the States General, subscribed by two hundred and sixty-nine traders, composed and presented with equal secrecy and circumspection. In this famous remonstrance they complained, that the violences and unjust depredations, committed by the English ships of war and privateers on the vessels and effects of them and their fellow-subjects, were not only continued, but daily multiplied; and cruelty and excesses carried to such a height, that the petitioners were forced to implore the assistance of their High Migh-

nesses to protect, in the most efficacious manner, their commerce and navigation, which were the two sinews of the republic. For this necessary purpose they offered to contribute each his contingent, and to arm at their own charge; and other propositions were made for an immediate augmentation of their marine.

While this party industriously laboured to effect a rupture with England, the princess Governante employed all her interest and address to divert them from this object, by alarming them with just apprehensions of the power of France, and exhorting them to augment their forces, so as to prepare against all attempts from that quarter. At the same time she spared no pains to compromise the differences between her husband's country and her father's kingdom; and, without doubt, her healing counsels were of great efficacy in preventing matters from coming to a very dangerous extremity.

The operations of Great Britain during this campaign were not confined to Europe: the continent of America and the coast of Africa both felt the weight of her arms. The whole gum trade from Cape Blanco to the river Gambia, an extent of five hundred miles, had been engrossed by the French, who built Fort Louis within the mouth of the Senegal, extending their factories near three leagues up that river, and on the same coast had fortified the island of Goree, in which they maintained a considerable garrison. The gum-senega, of which a great quantity is used by the manufacturers of England, being wholly in the hands of the enemy, the English dealers were obliged to buy it at second hand from the Dutch, who purchased it of the French, and exacted an exorbitant price for that commodity. This consideration forwarded the plan for annexing that country to the possessions of Great Britain.

The project was first conceived by Mr. Thomas Cumming, a sensible quaker, who, as a private merchant, had made a voyage to Portenderrick, an adjoining part of the coast, and contracted a personal acquaintance with Amir, the Moorish king of Legibelli*. He found this African prince extremely well disposed towards the subjects of Great Britain, whom he publicly preferred to all other Europeans; and so enraged against the French, that he declared he should never be easy till they were extirpated from the river Senegal. At that very time he had denounced war against them, and earnestly desired that the king of England would send out an armament to reduce Fort Louis and Goree, with some ships of force to protect the traders. In that case he promised to join his Britannic majesty's forces, and indulge his subjects with an exclusive commerce.

Mr. Cumming not only perceived the advantage that would accrue from such an exclusive privilege with regard to the gum, but foresaw many other important consequences of an extensive trade in a country which, over and above the gum-senega, abounds in many valuable articles, such as gold dust, elephants teeth, hides, cotton, bees-wax, slaves, ostrich feathers, indigo, ambergris, and civet. Pleased with the prospect of an acquisition so valuable to his country, this honest quaker was equally minute and indefatigable in his enquiries, with regard to the commerce of the coast, as well as the strength and situation of the French settlements on the river Senegal; and at his return to England actually projected the plan of an expedition for the conquest of Fort Louis.

This was presented to the Board of Trade, by whom it was approved, after a severe scrutiny: but it required the patriotic zeal, and invincible perseverance of Mr. Cumming, to surmount a variety of obstacles before it was adopted by the ministry; and even then it was not executed in its full extent. He was abridged of one large ship; and in lieu of six hundred land-forces to be draughted from different regiments, which he in vain demanded, no more than two hundred marines were allotted for this service.

After repeated solicitation, he at last, in the year 1757, obtained an order that the two annual ships bound to the coast of Guinea should be joined by a sloop and two busses, and make an attempt upon the French settlements in the river Senegal. These ships, however, were detained by contrary winds, until the season was too far advanced for undertaking the expedition, which was therefore postponed. In the beginning of the present year Mr. Cumming, being supported by the interest of a considerable merchant in the city, to whom he had imparted the plan, renewed his application to the ministry, and they determined to hazard the enterprize.

A small squadron was equipped for this expedition, under the command of captain Marsh, having on board a body of marines commanded by major Mason, with a detachment of artillery, ten pieces of cannon, eight mortars, and a considerable quantity of warlike stores and ammunition. Captain Walker was appointed engineer; and Mr. Cumming was concerned as a principal director and promoter of the expedition. This little armament sailed in the beginning of March; and in their passage touched at the island of Teneriffe, where, while the ships supplied themselves with wine and water, Mr. Cumming proceeded in the Swan sloop to Portenderrick, being charged with a letter of credence to his old friend the king of that country, who had favoured him in his last visit with an exclusive trade on that coast, by a formal charter, written in the Arabic language; which charter is still in his possession.

This prince was now up the country, engaged in a war with his neighbours, called the Diable Moors†; and the queen-dowager, who remained at Portenderrick, acquainted Mr. Cumming, that she could not at present spare any troops to join the English in their expedition against Senegal; but she assured him that, should the French be

* The name the natives give to that part of South Barbary, known to merchants and navigators by that of The Gum Coast, and called in maps, The Sandy Desert of Sara, and sometimes Zara.

† This is the name by which the subjects of Legibelli distinguish those of Brackna, who inhabit the country farther up the river Senegal, and were in constant alliance with the French.

extirpated, she and her subjects would go thither and settle. In the mean time, one of the chiefs, called prince Amir, dispatched a messenger to the king with advice of their arrival and design. He declared that he would, with all possible diligence, assemble three hundred warriors to join the English troops; and that, in his opinion, the king would reinforce them with a detachment from his army.

By this time captain Marsh, with the rest of the armament, had arrived at Portenderrick, and apprehending that the enemy might receive intimation of his design, resolved to proceed on the expedition without waiting for the promised auxiliaries. On the twenty-second of April he weighed anchor, and next day at four o'clock discovered the French flag flying upon Fort Louis, situated in the midst of a pretty considerable town, which exhibited a very agreeable appearance. The commodore having made prize of a Dutch ship richly laden with gum, which lay without the bar, came to anchor in Senegal road, at the mouth of the river; and here he observed several armed sloops which the enemy had posted to defend the passage of the bar, which is extremely dangerous. All the boats were employed in conveying the stores into the small craft, while three of the sloops continued exchanging shot over a narrow tongue of land with the vessels of the enemy, consisting of one brig and six armed sloops, mounted with great guns and swivels.

At length the channel being discovered, and the wind, which generally blows down the river, veering about, captain Millar, of the London bus, seized that opportunity; and passing the bar with a full sail, cast anchor on the inside, where he lay, till night, exposed to the whole fire of the enemy. Next day he was joined by the other small vessels, and a regular engagement ensued. This was warmly maintained on both sides, until the buffes and one dogger running aground, immediately bulged, and were filled with water. Then the troops they contained took to their boats, and with some difficulty reached the shore, where they drew up in a body, and were soon joined by their companions from the other vessels; so that now the whole amounted to three hundred and ninety marines, exclusive of the detachment of artillery.

As they laid their account with being attacked by the natives, who appeared on the shore at some distance, seemingly determined to oppose the descent, they immediately formed an intrenchment, and began to disembark the stores, great part of which lay under water. While they were employed in raising this occasional defence, the negroes came in great numbers and submitted; and on the succeeding day they were joined by three hundred seamen, who passed the bar in sloops, with their ensigns and colours flying.

They were proceeding in their operations with great spirit and activity, when two French deputies arrived at the intrenchment, with proposals for a capitulation from the governor of Fort Louis. After some hesitation, captain Marsh and major Mason agreed, that all the white people belonging to the French company at Senegal should be safely conducted to France in an English vessel, without being deprived of their private effects, provided all the merchandize and uncoined treasure should be delivered up to the victors; and that all the forts, store houses, vessels, arms, provisions, and every article belonging to the company in that river, should be put into the hands of the English immediately after the capitulation should be signed: that the free natives living at Fort Louis should remain in quiet possession of their effects, and in the free exercise of their religion; and that all negroes, mulattoes, and others, who could prove themselves free, should have it in their option either to remain in the place, or remove to any other part of the country.

The captains Campbell and Walker were immediately sent up the river with a flag of truce, to see the articles signed and executed; but the current of the stream was so strong, that they did not arrive at the fort till three in the morning. As soon as the day broke they hoisted their flag, and rowed up towards a battery on the point of the island, where they lay upon their oars very near a full hour, beating the chamade; but no notice was taken of their arrival. Suspecting the cause of this strange conduct, they retired down the river to their intrenchment, where they learned that the negroes on the island had risen in arms, and blocked up the French in Fort Louis, resolving to defend the place to the last extremity, unless they should be included in the capitulation. This circumstance was signified in a second letter from the governor, who likewise acquainted the English commander, that unless the French director-general should be allowed to remain with the natives, as a surety for the performance of that article of the capitulation in which they were comprehended, they would suffer themselves to be cut in pieces rather than submit.

This request being granted, the English forces began their march to Fort Louis, attended by a number of long-boats, in which the artillery and stores had been embarked. The French seeing them, immediately struck their colours; and major Mason took possession of the castle, where he found ninety-two pieces of cannon, with treasure and merchandize to a considerable value. The corporation and burghers of the town of Senegal submitted, and swore allegiance to his Britannic majesty: the neighbouring princes, accompanied by numerous retinues, visited the commander, and concluded treaties with the English nation; and the king of Portenderrick, or Legibelli, sent an ambassador from his camp to major Mason, with compliments of congratulation, and assurances of friendship.

The number of free independent negroes and mulattoes settled at Senegal amounted to three thousand, and many of these enjoyed slaves and possessions of their own. The two French factories of Podore and Galam, the latter situated nine hundred miles farther up the river, were included in the capitulation; so that Great Britain, almost without striking a blow, found herself in possession of a settlement, from which, with proper care, very considerable advantages may be derived.

This signal acquisition was, in a great measure, owing to the sagacity, zeal, and indefatigable efforts of Mr. Cumming, who first projected the plan, afterwards solicited the armament, and finally superintended the execution of it in person; a service which must ever recommend him to the love and esteem of his fellow-subjects, and ought certainly tainly to procure him a handsome gratuity from his country.

Fort Louis being furnished with an English garrison, and some armed vessels left to guard the passage of the bar, at the mouth of the river, the great ships set sail on an expedition, to the island of Goree, which lies at the distance of thirty leagues from Senegal. There the French company had considerable magazines and warehouses, and lodged the negro-slaves until they could be shipped for the West-Indies. If the additional force which Mr. Cumming proposed for the conquest of this island had been added to the armament, in all probability, the island would have been reduced; and, in that case, the nation would have saved a considerable expence of a subsequent expedition against it, under the conduct of commodore Kerpel. At present the ships, by which Goree was attacked, were found unequal to the attempt, and it miscarried accordingly; though the miscarriage was attended with little or no damage to the assailants.

However important the conquest of Senegal, it was of little consequence in comparison of the scenes which were acted in America, where, exclusive of the fleet and marines, the government had assembled about fifty thousand men, including two and twenty thousand regular troops. The earl of Loudon having returned to England, the chief command in America devolved to major-general Abercrombie; but as the objects of operation were various, the forces were divided into three separate bodies, under as many different commanders. About twelve thousand were destined to undertake the siege of Louisbourg, on the island of Cape Breton. The general himself reserved near sixteen thousand for the reduction of Crown Point, a fort situated on the lake Champlain; eight thousand, under the conduct of brigadier-general Forbes, were allotted for the conquest of Fort du Quesne, which stood a great way to the southward, near the river Ohio; and a considerable garrison was left at Annapolis in Nova Scotia.

The reduction of Louisbourg and the island of Cape Breton, being an object of immediate consideration, was undertaken with all possible dispatch. Major-general Amherst being joined by admiral Boscawen, with the fleet and forces from England, the whole armament, consisting of one hundred and fifty-seven sail, took their departure from the harbour of Halifax, in Nova Scotia, on the twenty-eighth of May; and on the second day of June part of the transports arrived in the bay of Gabarus, about seven miles to the westward of Louisburgh. The garrison of this place, commanded by the chevalier Drucour, consisted of two thousand five hundred regular troops, three hundred militia, formed of the burghers, and towards the end of the siege they were joined by three hundred and fifty Canadians, including threescore Indians.

The harbour was defended by six ships of the line; the Prudent and Entreprenant, of seventy-four guns each; the Capricieux, Celebre, and Biensaisant, of sixty-four; and the Apollo, of fifty. Besides these, there were five frigates, the Chevre, Biche, Fidelle, Diana, and Eccho, three of which the enemy had sunk across the harbour's mouth, in order to render it inaccessible to the English shipping. The fortifications were in bad repair, many parts of them crumbling down the covered way, several bastions exposed in such a manner as to be enfiladed by the besiegers, and no part of the town secure from the effects of cannonading and bombardment. The governor had taken all the precautions in his power to prevent a debarkation, by establishing a chain of posts, that extended two leagues and a half along the most accessible parts of the beach: intrenchments were thrown up, and batteries erected; but there were some intermediate places which could not be properly secured, and in one of these the English effected a landing.

The disposition being made for this purpose, a detachment, in several sloops, under convoy, passed by the mouth of the harbour towards Lorembec, in order to draw the enemy's attention that way, while the landing should be really attempted on the other side of the town. On the eighth day of June, the troops being distributed in the boats before day-break, in three divisions, several sloops and frigates, that were stationed along shore in the bay of Gabarus, began to scour the beach with their shot; and after the fire had continued about a quarter of an hour, the boats, containing the division on the left, were rowed towards the shore, under the command of brigadier-general Wolfe, an accomplished officer, who afterwards exhibited very extraordinary proofs of military genius.

At the same time the other two divisions, on the right and in the centre, commanded by the brigadiers Whitmore and Laurence, made a shew of landing, in order to divide and distract the enemy. Notwithstanding an impetuous surf, by which many boats were overset, and a very severe fire of cannon and musketry from the enemy's batteries, which did considerable execution, brigadier Wolfe pursued his point with equal courage and deliberation. The soldiers leaped into the water with the most eager alacrity, and gaining the shore, attacked the enemy in such a furious manner, that in a few minutes they drove them from their works and batteries, and obliged them to fly with the utmost precipitation. The other divisions landed also; but not without an obstinate opposition: and the stores, with the artillery, being brought on shore, the town of Louisbourg was formally invested.

The difficulty of landing stores and implements in boisterous weather, and the nature of the ground, which, being marshy, was unfit for the conveyance of heavy cannon, interrupted the operations of the siege; and Mr. Amherst made his approaches with great circumspection, securing his camp with redoubts and epaulements from any attacks of the Canadians, of which he apprehended there was a considerable body behind him on the island, as well as from the fire of the French shipping in the harbour, which would otherwise have galled him extremely in his advances.

The governor of Louisbourg having demolished the grand battery, which was detached from the body of the place, and withdrawn his out-posts, prepared for making a vigorous defence. A very severe fire, well directed, was maintained against the besiegers, and their works, from the town, the island battery, and the ships in the harbour, and divers sallies were made, though without much effect. In the mean time brigadier Wolfe, with a strong detachment, had marched round the north-east part of the harbour, and taken possession of the the Lighthouse-point, where he erected several batteries against the ships and the island fortification, which last was soon silenced.

On the nineteenth day of June the Eccho, a French frigate, was taken by the English cruisers, after having escaped from the harbour. From the officers on board this ship the admiral learned that the Bizarre, another frigate, had sailed from thence on the day of the disembarkation; and the Comete had likewise followed her example. Besides the regular approaches to the town, conducted by the engineers under the immediate command and inspection of general Amherst, divers batteries were raised by the detached corps under brigadier Wolfe, who exerted himself with surprising activity, and grievously annoyed the enemy, both in the town and the shipping.

On the twenty-first day of July the three great ships, the Entreprenant, Capricieux, and Celebre, were set on fire by the bomb-shells, and reduced to ashes; so that none remained but the Prudent and Bienfaisant, which the admiral undertook to destroy. For this purpose, in the night between the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth days of the month, the boats of the squadron were in two divisions detached into the harbour, under the command of two young captains, Laforey and Balfour. They accordingly penetrated, in the dark, through a terrible fire of cannon and musquetry, and boarded the enemy sword in hand. The Prudent, being aground, was set on fire, and destroyed; but the Bienfaisant was towed out of the harbour in triumph.

In the prosecution of the siege the admiral and general assisted each other with remarkable harmony; the former cheerfully furnishing the latter with cannon, and other implements, with detachments of marines to secure the posts on shore, and with parties of seamen to act as pioneers, and concur in working the guns and mortars. The fire of the town was managed with equal spirit and dexterity, and kept up with great perseverance; until, at length, their shipping being all taken and destroyed, the caserns ruined in the two principal bastions, forty out of fifty-two pieces of cannon dismounted, broke, or rendered unserviceable, and several practicable breaches effected, the governor, in a letter to Mr. Amherst, proposed a capitulation, on the same terms that were granted to the English at Portmahon.

In answer to this proposal he was told, that he and his garrison must surrender themselves prisoners of war, otherwise he might next morning expect a general assault by the shipping under admiral Boscawen. The chevalier Drucour, piqued at the severity of these conditions, replied, that, rather than comply with them, he would stand an assault; but the commissary-general, and intendant of the colony, presented a petition from the traders and inhabitants of the place, in consequence of which he submitted. On the twenty-seventh day of July three companies of grenadiers, commanded by major Farquhar, took possession of the western gate; and brigadier Whitmore was sent into the town, to see the garrison lay down their arms and deliver up their colours on the esplanade, and to post the necessary guards on the stores, magazines, and ramparts.

Thus, with the inconsiderable loss of about four hundred men killed or wounded, the English obtained possession of the important island of Cape Breton, and the strong town of Louisbourg, in which the victors found two hundred and twenty-one pieces of cannon, with eighteen mortars, and a large quantity of stores and ammunition. The merchants and inhabitants were conveyed to France in English bottoms; but the garrison, together with the sea-officers, marines, and mariners, amounting in all to five thousand six hundred and thirty-seven prisoners, were transported to England.

The loss of Louisbourg gave a fatal blow to the French interest in America, and facilitated the reduction of their other settlements in that part of the world. An account of the affair was immediately brought to England, in a vessel dispatched for that purpose, with captain Amherst, brother to the commander; who was also intrusted with eleven pair of colours taken at the siege. These were, by his majesty's order, carried in great parade, escorted by detachments of horse and foot guards, with kettle-drums and trumpets, from the palace of Kensington to St. Paul's cathedral, where they were deposited as trophies of victory, under a discharge of cannon, and other suitable expressions of triumph and exultation. Nor were the rejoicings for this conquest confined to London: addresses of congratulation were presented to his majesty by almost every town and corporation in the kingdom.

After the reduction of Cape Breton, some ships were detached with a body of troops, under the command of lieutenant-colonel lord Rollo, to take possession of the island of St. John, which also lies in the gulph of St. Laurence, and, by its fertility in corn and cattle, had, since the beginning of the war, supplied Quebec with considerable quantities of provision. It was likewise the asylum to which the French neutrals of Annapolis fled for shelter, from the English government; and the retreat from whence they and the Indians used to make their sudden incursions into Nova Scotia, where they committed the most inhuman barbarities on the defenceless subjects of Great Britain.

The number of inhabitants amounted to four thousand one hundred, who submitted, and brought in their arms: then lord Rollo took possession of the governor's quarters, where he found several scalps of Englishmen, whom the savages had butchered in consequence of the encouragement they received from their French patrons and allies, who gratified them with a certain sum for every scalp they produced. The island was stocked with above ten thousand head of black cattle, and some of the farmers raised each twelve hundred bushels of corn annually for the market of Quebec.

The joy and satisfaction arising from the conquest of Louisbourg and St. John was not a little damped by the disaster which happened to the main body of the British forces in America, under the immediate direction of general Abercrombie, who, as we have already remarked, had proposed the reduction of the French forts on the lakes George and Champlain, as the chief objects of his operation, with a view to protect the frontier of the British colonies, and open a passage for the future conquest of Canada.

In

In the beginning of July his forces, amounting to near seven thousand regular troops, and ten thousand provincials, embarked on the Lake George, in the neighbourhood of Lake Champlain, on board of nine hundred batteaus, and one hundred and thirty-five whale boats with provision, artillery, and ammunition; several pieces of cannon being mounted on rafts to cover the purposed landing, which was next day effected without opposition. The general's design was to attack Ticonderoga, a fort situated on a tongue of land extending between Lake George and a narrow gut that communicates with the Lake Champlain. This fortification was, on three sides, encompassed with water, and in front nature had secured it with a morass.

The English troops being landed, were immediately marshalled in three columns, and began their march to the enemy's advanced guard, consisting of one battalion, encamped behind a breastwork of logs, which they now abandoned with precipitation, after having set it on fire, and burned their tents and implements. The British forces prosecuted their march in the same order; but the route lying through a thick wood that did not admit of any regular progression or passage, and the guides proving extremely ignorant, the troops were bewildered, and the columns broken by falling in one upon another.

Lord Howe being advanced at the head of the right center column, encountered a French detachment, who had likewise lost their way in their retreat from the advanced guard, and a warm skirmish ensued. The dispute was maintained for some time with great obstinacy on both sides; nor did the enemy give way until they had lost about three hundred killed, and one hundred and forty-eight taken prisoners, including five officers. This petty advantage, however, was dearly purchased with the loss of lord Howe, who fell in the beginning of the action, universally lamented, as a young nobleman of the most promising talents, who had distinguished himself in a peculiar manner by his courage, activity, and rigid observation of military discipline, and had gained the esteem and affection of the soldiery by his generosity, humanity, and engaging address.

The general finding the troops greatly exhausted, from want of proper rest and refreshment, thought it most advisable to march back to the landing-place, where they accordingly arrived about eight in the morning. Then he detached lieutenant-colonel Bradstreet with one regular regiment, six companies of Royal Americans, the batteau men, and a body of rangers, to take possession of a saw-mill in the neighbourhood of Ticonderoga, which the enemy had deserted.

This post being secured, the general advanced again towards Ticonderoga, where he learned from the prisoners the enemy had collected eight battalions, with a body of Canadians and Indians, amounting in all to six thousand. These, they said, being encamped before the fort, were employed in forming a strong intrenchment, where they intended to wait for a reinforcement of three thousand men, which had been detached under the command of M. de Levi, to make a diversion on the side of the Mohawk river; but upon the news of Mr. Abercrombie's approach, were now recalled for the defence of Ticonderoga.

This information determined the English general to strike, if possible, some decisive stroke before the junction could be effected. He therefore early next morning detached his engineer across the river on the opposite side of the fort, to take a view of the enemy's intrenchments; and this officer reported, that the works being still unfinished, might be attempted with a good prospect of success. A disposition was made accordingly for the attack; and after proper guards had been left at the saw-mill and the landing-place, the whole army was put in motion.

They advanced with great intrepidity towards the intrenchments, which, however, they found impregnable. The breastwork was no less than eight feet high, and the ground before it covered with felled trees, with their boughs pointing outwards, projecting in such a manner as to render the intrenchment almost inaccessible. Notwithstanding these seemingly insuperable difficulties, the British troops marched up to the assault with an undaunted resolution, and sustained a terrible fire from the enemy's musquetry and cannon. They endeavoured to cut their way, sword in hand, through these embarrassments; and some of them even mounted the parapet; but the enemy were so well covered, that they could deliberately take aim without the least danger to themselves: the carnage was therefore great, and the troops began to fall into confusion, after several repeated attacks, which lasted above four hours, under the most disadvantageous circumstances.

The general by this time plainly perceived that no hope of success remained; and in order to prevent a total defeat, resolved to retreat with his army, which retired unmolested to their former camp, with the loss of about eighteen hundred men killed or wounded, including a great number of officers. Every corps of regular troops exerted themselves on this unfortunate occasion with remarkable bravery; but the greatest loss was sustained by lord John Murray's regiment, of which above one half of the private men, and twenty-five officers, were either slain upon the spot, or desperately wounded.

Mr. Abercrombie, unwilling to stay in the neighbourhood of the enemy, with forces which had received such a severe check, retired to the batteaus, and reembarking his troops, returned to the camp at Lake George, from whence he had taken his departure. The public were very free in their censures upon the conduct of this general. He was commended indeed for drawing off his men from a desperate attack, in which they were exposed to the fire of an enemy who lay secure in impregnable intrenchments: but his ordering his troops to storm such a camp without artillery, when he had a sufficient train for that service; his never advancing in person to the field of battle, when his presence was so indispensibly necessary, but remaining at the saw-mills, two miles from the scene of action; his flying from the neighbourhood of an enemy who never amounted to above three thousand; and to whom he would have been superior, even though they had been joined by the expected reinforcements: in these and many other respects he is said to have acted in a manner very unbecoming the character of a good general.

He might, it was affirmed, have remained on the spot, in order to execute some other enterprize when he should be reinforced in his turn; for general Amherst no sooner heard of his disaster than he returned with the troops from Cape Breton to New England, after having left a strong garrison at Louisbourg. At the head of six regiments he began his march to Albany, about the middle of September, in order to join the forces on the lake, that they might undertake some other service before the season should be exhausted.

In the mean time, general Abercrombie had detached lieutenant-colonel Bradstreet with a body of three thousand men, chiefly provincials, to execute a plan which this officer had formed against Cadaraqui, or Fort Frontenac, situated on the north side of the river St. Laurence, just where it takes its rise from the Lake Ontario. To the side of this lake he advanced with his detachment; and embarking in some sloops and batteaus provided for the purpose, landed within a mile of Fort Frontenac, the garrison of which, consisting of one hundred and ten men, with a few Indians, immediately surrendered prisoners of war. In this fortress, which commanded the mouth of the river St. Laurence, and served as a magazine to the more southern castles, Mr. Bradstreet found sixty pieces of cannon, sixteen small mortars, with an immense quantity of merchandize and provisions, deposited for the use of the French forces detached against brigadier Forbes, their western garrisons, and Indian allies, as well as for the subsistence of the corps commanded by M. de Levi, on his enterprise against the Mohawk river.

This fort he not only reduced without bloodshed, but also made himself master of all the enemy's shipping on the lake, amounting to nine armed vessels, some of which carried eighteen guns. Two of these Mr. Bradstreet conveyed to Oswego, whither he returned with his troops, after he had destroyed Fort Frontenac, with all the artillery, stores, provision, and merchandize, which it contained. By this loss the French troops to the southward were exposed to the hazard of starving; but it is not easy to conceive the general's reason for giving orders to abandon and destroy a fort which, if properly strengthened and sustained, might have rendered the English masters of the Lake Ontario, and grievously incommoded the enemy, both in their commerce and expeditions to the westward.

Mean while the expedition against Fort du Quesne was prosecuted with great activity by brigadier Forbes, who with his little army began his march on the thirtieth day of June, from Philadelphia for the river Ohio, a prodigious track of country very little known, destitute of military roads, incumbered with mountains, morasses, and woods, that were almost impassable. It was not without incredible difficulty that he procured provisions and carriages for this expedition, formed new roads, extended scouting parties, secured camps, and surmounted many other obstructions in the course of his tedious march, during which he was also harrassed by small detachments of the enemy's Indians.

Having advanced with the main body as far as Ray's Town, at the distance of ninety miles from Fort du Quesne, and sent before him colonel Bouquet with two thousand men, about fifty miles farther, to a place called Lyal-Henning, this officer detached major Grant at the head of eight hundred men, to reconnoitre the fort and its outworks. The enemy observing his approach, sent a body of troops against him sufficient to surround his whole detachment: a very warm action began: the English maintained it with their usual courage for three hours against cruel odds; but at length, being overpowered by numbers, they were obliged to give way, and retired in disorder to Lyal Henning, with the loss of about three hundred men killed or taken, including major Grant, who was carried prisoner to Fort du Quesne, and nineteen officers.

Notwithstanding this severe check, brigadier Forbes advanced with the army, determined to prosecute his operations with the utmost vigour; but the enemy dreading the prospect of a siege, dismantled and abandoned the fort, and retired down the river Ohio, to their settlements on the Mississippi. They deserted the fort on the twenty-fourth of November, and next day it was occupied by the British forces. As for the Indians of this country, they seemed heartily to renounce their connections with France, and submitted to the dominion of his Britannic majesty.

Brigadier Forbes having repaired the fort, changed its name from Du Quesne to Pittsburg, furnished it with a garrison of Provincials, and concluded treaties of friendship and alliance with the Indian tribes. Then he marched back to Philadelphia, and in his return built a blockhouse near Lyal Henning, for the protection of Pennsylvania; but he himself did not long survive these transactions: his constitution having been broken by the incredible fatigues he had undergone, he died soon after, universally regretted.

Thus have we given a particular account of all the remarkable events that happened during this campaign on the continent of America. The reader will be convinced, that notwithstanding the defeat at Ticonderoga, and the disaster of the advanced party in the neighbourhood of Fort du Quesne, the arms of Great Britain acquired many important advantages, and indeed paved the way for the reduction of Quebec, and conquest of all Canada. In the mean time, the admirals Boscawen and Hardy, having left a considerable squadron at Halifax in Nova Scotia, returned with four ships of the line to England, where they arrived in the beginning of November, after having given chase to six large French ships which they discovered to the westward of Scilly, but could not overtake or bring to an engagement.

The English settlements on the coast of Africa being deemed insecure whilst France kept possession of the island of Goree, the ministry of Great Britain resolved to crown the campaign in this part of the world with the reduction of that fortress. For this purpose commodore Keppel, brother to the earl of Albemarle, was vested with the command of a squadron, consisting of four ships of the line, several frigates, two bomb-ketches, and some transports, having on board seven hundred regular troops, commanded by colonel Worge, and embarked in the harbour of Corke in Ireland, from whence this whole armament took their departure on the eleventh of November.

After a difficult and dangerous passage, in which they touched at the island of Teneriffe, they arrived at Goree in the latter end of December, and the commodore made a disposition for attacking this island, which was remarkably strong by nature, but very indifferently fortified. Goree is a small barren island, extending about three quarters of a mile in length, of a triangular form, and on the south-west side rising into a rocky hill, on which the small fort of St. Michael is situated. There is another, still more considerable, called St. Francis, towards the other extremity of the island; and several batteries were raised around its circumference, mounted with about one hundred pieces of cannon and four mortars. The French governor, M. de St. Jean, had great plenty of ammunition, and his garrison amounted to three hundred men, exclusive of as many negro inhabitants.

The flat-bottomed boats for landing the troops being hoisted out, and ranged along-side of the different transports, the commodore stationed his ships on the west side of the island, and the engagement began with a shell from one of the ketches. This was a signal for the great ships, which poured in their broadsides without intermission, and the fire was returned with equal vivacity from all the batteries of the island. In the course of the action, the cannonading from the ships became so severe and terrible, that the French garrison fled from their quarters in spite of all the efforts of the governor, who endeavoured to keep them to their duty; but was obliged to strike his colours, and surrender at discretion, after a short but warm dispute, in which the loss of the British forces hardly amounted to one hundred men killed and wounded.

The success of the day was the more extraordinary, as the French garrison had not lost a man, except one negro killed by the bursting of a bomb-shell, and the number of their wounded was very inconsiderable. The enemy's colours being struck, as a signal of submission, the commodore sent a detachment of marines on shore, who disarmed the garrison, and hoisted the British flag upon the castle of St. Michael. In the mean time, the governor and the rest of the prisoners were distributed among the shipping. Thus the important island of Goree fell into the hands of the English, together with two trading vessels that happened to be at anchor in the road; and stores, money, and merchandize, to the value of twenty thousand pounds.

Part of the troops being left in garrison at Goree, under the command of major Newton, together with three sloops for his service; the squadron being watered and refreshed from the continent, that part of which is governed by one of the Jalous kings; and the prisoners with their baggage being dispatched in three cartel-ships to France, the commodore set sail for Senegal, and reinforced Fort Louis with the rest of the troops under colonel Worge, who was about this time favoured with a visit by the king of Legibelli. Great pains were taken by the colonel to secure the friendship of this potentate, though he could not comply with all his requests, inasmuch as he desired him to espouse his cause against some of the neighbouring nations; a favour which he could by no means grant, with any regard to the interest of his country.

Commodore Keppel having reduced Goree, and reinforced the garrison at Senegal, returned to England; where all his ships arrived, after a very tempestuous voyage, in which the squadron had been dispersed.

This expedition, however successful in the main, was attended with one misfortune, namely, the loss of the Litchfield ship of war, commanded by captain Barton, which, together with one transport and bomb-tender, was wrecked on the coast of Barbary, about nine leagues to the northward of Saffy, in the dominions of Morocca. One hundred and thirty men, including several officers, perished on this occasion; but the captain and the rest of the company, to the number of two hundred and twenty, made shift to gain the shore, where they ran the risk of starving, and were cruelly used by the natives, although a treaty of peace at that time subsisted between Great Britain and Morocco: nay, they were even enslaved by the emperor, who detained them in captivity until they were ransomed by the British government.

The incidents of the war that happened in the West Indies, during these transactions, were neither numerous nor important. Nothing of consequence was achieved in the neighbourhood of Jamaica, where admiral Cotes commanded a small squadron, from which he detached cruizers occasionally for the protection of the British commerce; and at Antigua the trade was effectually secured by the vigilance of captain Tyrrel, an officer of distinguished merit.

In the month of March this gentleman, with his own ship the Buckingham, and the Cambridge, another of the line, destroyed a fort on the island of Martinique, and sunk four privateers riding under its protection: but his valour was much more eminently displayed in a subsequent engagement, which happened in the month of November. Being detached on a cruise in his own ship the Buckingham by commodore Moore, who commanded at the Leeward Islands, he fell in with the Wesel sloop, commanded by captain Boles, between the islands of Montserrat and Guadalupe, and immediately discovered a fleet of nineteen sail, under convoy of a French ship of war carrying seventy-four cannon, and two large frigates.

Captain Tyrrel immediately gave chase with all the sail he could carry; and the Wesel, running close to the enemy, received a whole broadside from the large ship, which however she sustained without much damage: nevertheless, Mr. Tyrrel ordered her commander to keep aloof, as he could not be supposed able to bear the shock of large metal, and he himself prepared for the engagement. The enemy's large ship, the Florissant, though of much greater force than the Buckingham, instead of waiting her approach, made a running fight with her stern-chace, while the two frigates harrassed him in his course, sometimes raking him fore and aft, and sometimes lying on his quarter.

At length he came along-side of the Florissant, within pistol-shot, and poured in a whole broadside, which did considerable execution. The salutation was returned with equal vivacity, and a furious engagement ensued. Captain Tyrrel was wounded in the face, and lost three fingers of his right hand; so that being entirely disabled, he was obliged to transfer the command of the ship to his first lieutenant, Mr. Marshal, who continued the battle battle with great gallantry until he lost his life: then the charge devolved to the second lieutenant, who acquitted himself with equal bravery, and sustained a desperate fight against the three ships of the enemy.

The officers and crew of the Buckingham exerted themselves with equal vigour and deliberation; and captain Troy, who commanded a detachment of marines on the poop, plied his small arms so effectually as to drive the French from their quarters. At length confusion, terror, and uproar, prevailing on board the Florissant, her firing ceased, and her colours were hauled down about the twilight: but her commander, observing that the Buckingham was too much damaged in her rigging to pursue with any hope of success, ordered all his sails to be set, and escaped in the dark with his two consorts. Nothing but this circumstance could have prevented a British ship of sixty-five guns, containing but four hundred and seventy-two men, from taking a French ship of the line, mounted with seventy-four pieces of cannon, provided with seven hundred men, and assisted by two large frigates, one of thirty-eight, and the other of twenty-eight guns.

The loss of the Buckingham in this action did not exceed fifty men in killed and wounded; whereas the number of the slain on board the Florissant did not fall short of one hundred and eighty, and that of her wounded is said to have amounted to above three hundred. She was so disabled in her hull that she could hardly be kept above water, until she reached Martinique, where she was repaired; and the largest frigate, together with the loss of forty men, sustained such damage as to be for some time quite unfit for service.

The military transactions in the East Indies were chequered with a variety of fortune; but, on the whole, the designs of the enemy were entirely disappointed. The French king had sent a considerable reinforcement to that part of the world, under the command of general Lally, an officer of Irish extraction, together with such a number of ships as rendered the squadron of M. d'Apché superior to that of admiral Pocock, who had succeeded admiral Watson, lately deceased, in the command of the English fleet stationed on the coast of Coromandel, which in the beginning of this year was joined by several ships from England, under the direction of commodore Stevens.

Immediately after this junction, which was effected in the road of Madras on the twenty-fifth of March, admiral Pocock, who had already distinguished himself by his courage, vigilance, and conduct, proceeded to windward, with a view to intercept the French squadron, of which he had received intelligence. In two days he discovered in the road of Fort St. David the enemy's fleet, consisting of nine ships, which immediately stood out to sea, and formed the line of battle a-head. The admiral took the same precaution, and bearing down upon M. d'Apché, the engagement began about three in the afternoon.

The French commodore having maintained a warm fight for about two hours, bore away with his whole fleet; and being reinforced by two ships, formed a line of battle again to leeward. Admiral Pocock's own ship and three others being greatly disabled in their masts and rigging, two of his captains having misbehaved in the action, and night coming on, he did not think proper to pursue them with all the sail he could carry; nevertheless he followed them at a proper distance, standing to the south-west, in order to preserve the weather-gage, in case he should have an opportunity to renew the action in the morning.

In this expectation, however, he was disappointed: the enemy shewed no lights, nor made any signals that could be observed; and in the morning they had entirely disappeared. Mr. Pocock, on the supposition that they had weathered him in the night, endeavoured to work up after them to windward; but finding he lost ground considerably, he dropped anchor about three leagues to the northward of Sadras, and received intelligence from the chief of that settlement, that one of the largest French ships having been greatly damaged in the engagement, was run ashore to the southward of Alamparve, where their whole squadron lay at anchor.

Such was the issue of the first action between the English and French squadrons in the East Indies, which, over and above the loss of a capital ship, is said to have cost the enemy about five hundred men, whereas the British admiral did not lose one fifth part of that number. Being dissatisfied with the behaviour of three of his captains, he no sooner returned to Madras than he appointed a court-martial to enquire into their conduct; in consequence of which two of them were dismissed from that service, and the third was sentenced to lose one year's rank as a post captain.

In the mean time Mr. Lally had landed his troops at Pondicherry, and taking the field immediately laid siege to Fort St. David, while the French blocked it up by sea. Two English ships being at anchor in the road when the enemy arrived, their captains seeing no possibility of escaping, ran them on shore, set them on fire, and retired with their men into the fort, which however was in a few days surrendered.

Admiral Pocock having, to the best of his power, refitted his shattered ships, set sail again on the tenth of May, in order to attempt the relief of Fort St. David's; but, notwithstanding his utmost endeavours, he could not reach it in time to be of any service. On the thirtieth day of the month he arrived in the neighbourhood of Pondicherry, from whence the French squadron stood away early next morning; nor was it in his power by any means to overtake them, though he made all possible efforts for that purpose. Then receiving intelligence that Fort St. David's was surrendered to the enemy, he sailed back again to Madras, in order to refresh his squadron.

On the twenty-fifth of July he set sail a third time in quest of M. d'Apché, and in two days discovered his squadron, consisting of eight ships of the line and a frigate, at anchor in the road of Pondicherry. They no sooner perceived him approaching than they stood out to sea as before, and he continued to chase in hope of bringing them to an engagement; but all his endeavours proved ineffectual till the third day of August, when having gained the weather-gage, he bore down upon them in order of battle.

The engagement began with great fury on both sides; but in little more than ten minutes M. d'Apché set his foresail and bore away, his whole squadron following his example, and maintaining a running fight in a very irregular line. The British admiral then made a signal for a general chase, which the enemy observing, thought proper to cut away their boats, and croud with all the sail they could carry. They escaped by favour of the night into the road of Pondicherry, and Mr. Pocock anchored with his squadron off Carical, a French settlement, having thus obtained an undisputed victory, with the loss of thirty men killed, and one hundred and sixteen wounded, including commodore Stevens and captain Martin, though their wounds were not dangerous.

The number of killed and wounded on board of the French squadron amounted, according to report, to five hundred and forty; and their ships were so much shattered, that in the beginning of September their commodore sailed for the islands of Bourbon, in the same latitude with Madagascar, in order to refit; thus leaving the dominion and sovereignty of the Indian seas to the English admiral, whose fleet, from the beginning of this campaign, had been much inferior to the French squadron in number of ships and men, as well as in weight of metal.

Mr. Lally, having made himself master of Cudalore and Fort St. David's, resolved to extort a sum of money from the king of Tanjour, on pretence that, in the last war, he had given an obligation to the French governor, for a certain sum which had never been paid. Accordingly, he advanced with a body of three thousand men into the dominions of Tanjour, and demanded seventy-two lack of rupees. This extravagant demand being rejected, he plundered Nagare, a trading town on the sea coast, and afterwards laid siege to the capital; but after he had prosecuted his operations until a breach was made in the walls, his provisions and ammunition beginning to fail, several vigorous sallies being made by the forces of the king of Tanjour, and the place well defended by European gunners, sent from the English garrison at Trichenopoli, he found himself obliged to abandon the enterprize and retreat in a hurry, with the loss of his artillery.

He arrived at Carical about the middle of August, and from thence returned to Pondicherry towards the latter end of September. He afterwards quartered his troops in the province of Arcot, took possession of the city without the least resistance, and began to make preparations for the siege of Madras, which shall be recorded among the transactions of the ensuing year. In the mean time, the land forces belonging to the East India company were so much out-numbered by the reinforcements which arrived with Mr. Lally, that they could not pretend to make head against the enemy, but were obliged to remain on the defensive, and provide as well as they could for the security of Fort St. George, and the other settlements in that part of India.

Having thus related, with as much precision as is consistent with perspicuity, the events of the war in Europe, America, Africa, and Asia, I shall close the foreign transactions of this year with laying before the reader some account of the state, as well as history, of the different courts of Europe at the end of the campaign. I have formerly observed, that the events of the campaign in Germany produced no change in the political systems adopted by the different princes on the continent.

The king of Spain wisely continued to adhere to that neutrality which he had hitherto observed, notwithstanding the intrigues of the French partisans at the court of Madrid, who endeavoured to alarm his jealousy by the conquests which the English had projected in America.

The king of Sardinia sagaciously kept aloof, resolving, in imitation of his predecessors, to preserve his power on a respectable footing, and be ready to take advantage of all opportunities to extend and promote the interest of his crown, and the commerce of his subjects.

As for the king of Portugal, he had prudently embraced the same maxims of forbearance; but in the latter end of the season his attention was ingrossed by a domestic incident of a very extraordinary nature. Whether he had, by particular instances of severity, provoked the resentment of certain individuals, or exercised his dominion in such acts of arbitrary power as excited a general spirit of disaffection among his nobility; or, lastly, by the vigorous measures pursued against the encroaching jesuits in Paraguay, and their correspondents in Portugal, had exposed himself to the hatred of that society, I shall not pretend to determine: perhaps all these motives concurred in giving birth to a conspiracy against his life, which was actually executed at this juncture with the most desperate resolution.

On the third day of September the king, according to custom, going out in a carriage to take the air, attended by one domestic, was, in the night, at a solitary place near Belem, attacked by three men on horseback, armed with blunderbusses, one of whom fired his piece at the coachman without effect. The man, however, terrified both on his own account and that of his sovereign, drove the mules at full speed; a circumstance which, in some measure, disconcerted the other two conspirators, who pursued him at full gallop; and having no leisure to take aim, discharged their pieces at random through the back of the carriage. The flugs with which they were loaded happened to pass between the king's right arm and his breast, dilacerating the parts from the shoulder to the elbow, but without damaging the bone, or penetrating into the cavity of the body.

Finding himself grievously wounded, and the blood flowing apace, he, with such presence of mind as cannot be sufficiently admired, instead of proceeding to the palace, which was at some distance, ordered the coachman to return to Junqueira, where his principal surgeon resided, and there his wounds were immediately dressed. By this resolution, he not only prevented the irreparable mischief that might have arisen from an excessive effusion of blood, but, without all doubt, saved his life from the hands of other assassins posted on the road to accomplish the murder, in case he should escape alive from the first attack. This instance of the king's recollection was magnified into a miracle, on the supposition that it must have been the effect of divine inspiration; and indeed, among a people addicted to superstition, might well pass for a favourable interposition of Providence.

The king being thus disabled in his right arm, bestowed, by a public decree, the absolute power of government upon the queen his consort. In the mean time, no person had access to his presence but herself, the first minister, the cardinal de Saldanha, the physicians, and surgeons. An embargo was immediately laid on all the shipping in the port of Lisbon. Rewards were publicly offered, together with a promise of pardon to the accomplices, for discovering any of the assassins; and such other measures taken, that in a little time the whole conspiracy was unfolded: a conspiracy the more dangerous, as it appeared to have been formed by persons of the first quality and influence.

The duke de Aveiro, of the family of Mascarenhas; the marquis de Tavora, who had been viceroy of Goa, and now actually enjoyed the commission of general of the horse; the count de Atouguia, the marquis de Alloria, together with their wives, children, and whole families, were arrested immediately after the assassination, as principals in the design; and many other accomplices, including some jesuits, were apprehended in the sequel. The further particulars relating to this affair, with the fate of the conspirators, shall be related among the transactions of the ensuing year. At present it will be sufficient to observe, that the king's wounds were productive of no bad consequences; nor did the imprisonment of the conspirators occasion any disturbance in the kingdom.

The internal tranquility of France continued to be disturbed by the disputes between the parliaments and clergy, concerning the bull Unigenitus. In vain the king had exerted his authority; first proposing an accommodation; then commanding the parliaments to desist from taking cognizance of a religious contest, which did not fall under their jurisdiction; and, thirdly, banishing their persons, and annulling their power. He afterwards found it necessary to recal and reinstate those venerable patriots; and, being convinced of the intolerable insolence and turbulent spirit of the archbishop of Paris, had exiled that prelate in his turn.

He was no sooner restored to his function than he resumed his former conduct, touching the denial of sacraments to those who refused to acknowledge the bull Unigenitus. He even acted with redoubled zeal; intrigued with the other prelates; caballed among the inferior clergy; and not only revived, but augmented the troubles throughout the whole kingdom. Bishops, curates, and monks, presumed to withhold spiritual consolation from persons in extremity, and were punished by the civil power. Other parliaments of the kingdom followed the example set them by that of Paris, in asserting their authority and privileges. The king commanded them to desist, on pain of incurring his displeasure: they remonstrated and persevered; while the archbishop repeated his injunctions and censures, and continued to inflame the dispute to such a dangerous degree, that he was given to understand he should be again obliged to quit the capital, if he did not proceed with more moderation.

These domestic disputes, however, did not prevent the French ministry from concerting proper measures to prosecute the war in Europe and America. In the course of this year they had not only considerably reinforced their armies in Germany, but made surprising efforts to supply the colony of Canada with troops, artillery, stores, and ammunition, for its defence against the operations of the British forces, which greatly outnumbered the French upon that continent. The court of Versailles employed every stratagem to elude the vigilance of the British cruisers. The ships destined for America they detached, both single and in convoys, sometimes from the Mediterranean, sometimes from their harbours in the Channel. They assembled transports in one port, in order to divert the attention of the English from another where their convoys lay ready for sailing; and in boisterous weather, when the British men of war could no longer block up their harbours, their store ships came forth, and hazarded the voyage for the relief of their American settlements.

Those that had the good fortune to arrive on the coast of that continent were obliged to have recourse to different expedients for escaping the British squadrons stationed at Halifax, or cruising in the bay of St. Laurence. They either ventured to enter the river, before it was clear of the ice, so early in the spring, that the English had not yet left the harbour of Nova Scotia; or they waited on the coast of Newfoundland for such thick fogs as might screen them from the notice of the British commanders in sailing up the gulph; or, lastly, they penetrated through the Streights of Belleisle; a dangerous passage, which however led them directly into the river St. Laurence, at a considerable distance above the station of the English squadron.

Though the French navy was by this time so diminished, that it could neither cope with the English by sea, nor furnish proper convoys for their commerce; this circumstance did not hinder the ministry of that kingdom from alarming Great Britain with the fears of an invasion. Flat-bottomed boats were built, transports collected, large ships of war equipped, and troops ordered to assemble on the coast for embarkation: but this was no more than a feint to excite the apprehensions of the English, embarrass the administration, prejudice the national credit, and deter the government from sending forces to Germany, to prosecute the war in that quarter.

A much more effectual method they took to distress the trade of England, by laying up their useless ships of war, and encouraging of stout privateers, that did considerable damage to the commerce of Great Britain and Ireland, by cruising in the seas of Europe and America. Some of them lay close in the harbours of the Channel, fronting the coast of England, and darted out occasionally on the trading ships of this nation, as they received intelligence from boats employed for that purpose. Some chose their station in the North Sea, where a great number of captures were made upon the coast of Scotland: others cruised in the chops of the Channel, and even to the westward of Ireland; but the far greater number scoured the seas in the neighbourhood of the Leeward Islands in the West Indies, where they took a prodigious number of British ships sailing to and from the sugar colonies, and carried them to their own settlements in Martinique, Guadalupe, or St. Domingo.

The

The Dutch still continued to persevere in the same base and disingenuous conduct which they had invariably observed since the commencement of the war. I have, in the beginning of this year's transactions, remarked, that a great number of their ships were taken by the English cruizers, and condemned as legal prizes, for having French property on board: that the Dutch merchants, enraged at their losses, exclaimed against the English as pirates and robbers, petitioned the States for redress in very high terms, and even loudly clamoured for a war against Great Britain.

The charge of violence and injustice which they brought against the English, for taking and confiscating the ships that transported to Europe the produce of the French in the West Indies, they founded on the tenth article of a treaty of commerce between Great Britain and the States-general of the United Provinces, concluded in the year 1668, stipulating, "That whatever shall be found on board the ships of the subjects of the United Provinces, though the lading or part thereof may belong to the enemies of Great Britain, shall be free and unmolested, except these be prohibited goods, which are to be served in the manner prescribed by the foregoing articles." From this article the Dutch merchants inferred, that if there be no prohibited goods on board, the English had no right to stop or molest any of their ships, or make the least enquiry to whom the merchandize belonged, whence it was brought, or whither bound.

This plea the English ministry would by no means admit, for the following reasons; a general and perpetual licence to carry on the whole trade of their enemy, would be such a glaring absurdity as no convention could authorize: common sense has dictated, and Grotius declared, that no man can be supposed to have consented to an absurdity; therefore the interpretation given by the Dutch to this article, could not be supposed to be its true and genuine meaning, which indeed relates to nothing more than the common course of trade, as it was usually carried on in time of peace. But, even should their interpretation be accepted, the article and the treaty itself would be superseded and annulled by a subsequent treaty, concluded between the two nations in 1675, and often confirmed since that period, stipulating, in a secret article, "That neither of the contracting parties should give, nor consent that any of their subjects and inhabitants should give any aid, favour, or counsel, directly or indirectly, by sea or land, or on the fresh waters; nor should furnish or permit the subjects or inhabitants of their respective territories, to furnish any ships, soldiers, seamen, victuals, money, instruments of war, gunpowder, or any other necessities for making war, to the enemies of either party, of any rank or condition soever."

Now the Dutch had violated this article in many instances during the present war, both in Europe and America; and as they had so openly contravened one treaty, the English were not obliged to observe any other. They had, moreover, forfeited all right to the observance of the treaty in question, by refusing the succours with which they were bound, in the most solemn manner, to furnish the king of Great Britain, in case any of his territories in Europe should be attacked; for nothing could be more weak and frivolous than the allegation upon which this refusal was founded; namely, that the hostilities in Europe were commenced by the English, when they seized and confiscated the vessels of France; and they, being the aggressors, had no right to insist upon the succours stipulated in a treaty which was purely defensive. If this argument has any weight, the treaty itself is totally annulled. The French, as they did in the present case, will always begin the war in America: and when their ships, containing reinforcements and stores for the maintenance of that war, shall be taken on the European seas, perhaps in consequence of their being exposed for that purpose, they will exclaim that the English were the aggressors in Europe, consequently intitled to receive no benefit from the defensive treaty subsisting between them and the States-general of the United Provinces. It being impossible for the English to put an end to the war, while their enemies are enabled to maintain it by their commerce carried on in neutral bottoms, they are obliged to suppress such iniquitous collusion by that necessity which Grotius himself hath admitted to be a sufficient excuse for deviating from the letter of any treaty whatever.

In time of peace no Dutch ships were allowed to carry the produce of any French sugar island, or even to trade in any of the French ports in America or the West Indies; consequently the treaty which they quote can never justify them in carrying on a commerce which, as it did not exist, and was not foreseen, could not possibly be prohibited when that convention was ratified. Grotius, whose authority is held as uncontroversible among the Dutch, has asserted, that every nation has a right to seize and confiscate the goods of any neutral power which shall attempt to carry them into any place which is blocked up by that nation, either by land or sea. The French islands in the West Indies were so blocked up by the English cruisers, that they could receive no relief from their own government; consequently no neutral power could attempt to supply them without falling under this predicament.

It was for these reasons that the king of England declared, by the mouth of Mr. Yorke, his minister plenipotentiary at the Hague, in a conference held in the month of August with the deputies of the States general, "That though he was ready to concur in every measure that should be proposed for giving satisfaction to their High Mightinesses, with whom he had always studied to live in the most perfect union, he was nevertheless determined, not to suffer the trade of the French colonies in America to be carried on by the subjects of other powers, under the specious pretext of neutrality; nor to permit words to be interpreted as a licence to drive a trade with his enemies, which, though not particularly specified in the articles of contraband, was nevertheless rendered such in all respects, and in every sense, by the nature of the circumstances."

Besides the universal clamour excited in Holland, and the famous memorial delivered to the States-general, which we have already mentioned, a deputation of merchants waited four times successively on the princess regent, to represent their grievances, grievances, and solicit her concurrence in augmenting the navy for the preservation of their commerce. She promised to employ her best offices with the court of Great Britain; and these co-operating with the representation made by the States-general, the English minister was empowered to open conferences at the Hague, in order to settle the present dispute by an amicable accommodation.

These endeavours, however, were not attended with the desired effect. The British cruisers continued to take, and the British courts to condemn, all Dutch vessels carrying the produce of the French sugar islands. The merchants of Holland and Zealand renewed their complaints with redoubled vehemence, and all the trading part of the nation, reinforced by the whole party that opposed the house of Orange, cried aloud for an immediate augmentation of the marine, and reprisals upon the English navy. The princess-regent, in order to avoid extremities, was obliged not only to exert all her interest with the States-general, but also to play off one faction against another, in the way of remonstrance and exclamation.

So early as the month of June she presented a memorial to the States-general, reminding them, that in the beginning of the war between France and England, she had recommended an augmentation of their land forces, to strengthen the garrisons of the frontier towns, and cover the territories of the republic from invasion. She observed, that the provinces of Gueldres and Overijssel, alarmed by the proximity of two formidable armies, had resolved to demand, that the augmentation of their land-forces should be taken into consideration by the other provinces; and requested her to enforce their solicitations that this measure might immediately take place. With this request, she said, she had the more readily complied, as she could not but be sensible of the imminent danger to which the republic was exposed, especially since the Hanoverian army had passed the Rhine; and as it behoved the state to put itself in a condition to hinder either army from retiring into the territories of the republic, if it should be defeated; for, in that case, the conqueror being authorised to pursue his enemy wherever he can find him, would carry the war into the heart of their country.

This representation had no other effect than that of suspending the execution of the measure which each party proposed. The princess, in her answer to the fourth deputation of the merchants, declared, that she beheld the present state of their trade with the most anxious concern: that its want of protection was not her fault, but that of the towns of Dort, Haarlem, Amsterdam, Torgau, Rotterdam, and the Brille; to whose conduct it was owing that the forces of the state, by sea and land, were not now on a better footing. The deputies were afterwards referred to her minister, M. de la Larrey, to whom they represented, that the augmentation of the land forces, and the equipment of a fleet, were matters as distinct from each other as light from darkness: that there was no pressing motive for an augmentation of the army; whereas innumerable reasons rendered the equipment of a fleet a matter of the most urgent necessity.

In a few days after this representation was made, the princess, in an assembly of the States-general, requested their High Mightinesses, that seeing their earnest and repeated efforts to persuade the provinces of Holland, Zealand, Friesland, and West-Friesland, to agree to the proposed augmentation of forces by sea and land, had not hitherto met with success, they would now contrive and concur in some feasible expedient for terminating this affair, and the sooner the better; in order, on one hand, to satisfy the strong and well-grounded instances made by the provinces of Gueldres, Utrecht, Overijssel, and Groningen; and, on the other, to comply with the ardent and just desires expressed by the commercial inhabitants of the country.

She told them, that the deputation which waited on her was composed of forty merchants, a number that merited attention no less than the speech they pronounced, of which a great number of printed copies were distributed through all parts of the country. Without making any particular remarks on the harangue, she only observed, that the spirit of it did not tend to forward the negotiation begun with Great-Britain, nor induce the nation to prefer a convention to a rupture with that crown. From this circumstance she inferred, it was more than time to finish the deliberations on the proposal for augmenting the forces both by sea and land; a measure, she said, without which the state was, and always would be, exposed to every sort of danger and misfortune.

In consequence of this interposition, the States-General that same day sent a letter to the states of Holland and West-Friesland, signifying the sentiments of the Princess Regent, and representing the necessity of complying with her proposal of the double augmentation. They observed, that an augmentation of the land-forces, for the defence of the frontiers, was no less requisite than an equipment by sea for the security of commerce: that the states of the provinces of Gueldres, Utrecht, Overijssel, and Groningen, concurred with them in the same opinion; and accordingly had insisted, by divers letters and propositions, on those two points so essential to the public interest.

After taking notice of the danger of delay, and the fatal effects of discord, they proposed, that, by a reciprocal indulgence, one party should comply with the sentiments of the other, in order to avoid a schism and internal division among the confederates, the consequences of which would be very alarming; while the republic, in the mean time, would remain in a defenceless condition both by sea and land, and depend, for its safety, upon the humour and caprice of its powerful neighbours. They conjured them therefore, as they valued the interest of their country, and all that was dear to them; as they regarded the protection of the good inhabitants, the concord and harmony which at all times, but especially at the present critical juncture, was of the last necessity, that they would seriously reflect upon the exhortations of her royal highness, as well as on the repeated instances of the majority of the confederates; and take a wise and salutary resolution, with regard to the proposed augmentation of the land-forces; so that this addition, together with an equivalent at sea, might, the sooner the better, be unanimously brought to a conclusion.

In the month of April this year died, in the eighty-fourth year of his age, pope Benedict XIV.

(Prosper

(Prosper Lambertini) a pontiff universally esteemed for his good sense, moderation, and humanity; and in July was succeeded in the papacy by cardinal Charles Rezzonico, bishop of Padua, by birth a Venetian. He was formerly auditor of the Rota; afterwards advanced to the purple by pope Clement XII. at the nomination of the republic of Venice; was distinguished by the title of St. Maria d'Ara Cæli, the principal convent of the Cordeliers, and nominated protector of the Pandours, or Illyrians. When he ascended the papal chair, he assumed the name of Clement XIII. in gratitude to the last of that name, who was his benefactor. Though of a disagreeable person, and even deformed in his body, he enjoys good health and a vigorous constitution. As an ecclesiastic, his life is exemplary; his morals are pure and unimpeached: in his character, he is said to be learned, diligent, steady, devout, and in every respect worthy to succeed such a predecessor as Benedict.

I shall next, previous to my opening the history of the succeeding session of parliament, present the reader with the most remarkable domestic occurrences of the year.

It is a circumstance that redounds greatly to the honour of the English ministry, that, while the operations of the war were vigorously carried on in the four quarters of the globe, the island of Great Britain, which may be considered as the center that gave motion to this vast machine, enjoyed all the tranquillity of the most profound peace, and saw nothing of war but the preparations and trophies, which served only to animate the nation to a desire of further conquest: for the dejection occasioned by the misfortune at St. Cassin soon vanished before the prospect of victory and success. Considering the agitation naturally produced among the common people, by the practice of pressing men into the service of the navy, the raising of so many new corps of soldiers, and the endeavours used in forming the national militia, very few disturbances happened to interrupt the internal repose of the nation.

Against private acts of malice, violence, and rapine, however, no community whatsoever is secure. In the month of April the temporary wooden bridge over the Thames, built for the convenience of carriages and passengers, while the workmen should be employed in widening and repairing London-bridge, was maliciously set on fire in the night, and continued burning till noon next day, when the ruins of it fell into the river. The destruction of this convenience proved very detrimental to the commerce of the city, notwithstanding the care and discretion of the magistrates in applying remedies to the present misfortune. A promise of the king's pardon was offered in a public advertisement, by the secretary of state, and a reward of two hundred pounds by the city of London, to any person who should discover the perpetrator of such a wicked outrage; but nevertheless he escaped detection. No individual, nor any society of men, could have the least interest in the execution of such a scheme, except the body of London watermen: but as no discovery was made to the prejudice of any person belonging to that society, the deed was imputed to the malice of some secret enemy of the public. Even after a new temporary bridge was erected, another attempt was made (in all probability by the same incendiary) to reduce the whole to ashes, but happily miscarried; and a guard was appointed to prevent any such atrocious efforts for the future.

Dangerous tumults were excited in and about Manchester, by a prodigious number of manufacturers, who had left off working, and formed a combination to raise, by force, the price of their labour. They had concerted a regular plan, and collected large sums for the maintenance of the poorer sort, while they refused to work for their families. They insulted and abused all those who would not join in this confederacy; dispersed incendiary letters, and denounced terrible threats against all such as should presume to oppose their proceedings. But these menaces had no effect upon the magistrates and justices, who exerted themselves with such spirit and activity, that the ring-leaders being apprehended and punished by law, the rest were soon reduced to order.

In the month of June Florence Hensley, an obscure physician, and native of Ireland, who had been arrested for treasonable practices, was tried at the court of King's Bench, on an indictment for high-treason. In the course of the trial it appeared, that he had been employed as a spy by the French ministry; to whom, in consideration of a pauper's pension, he sent intelligence of every material incident in Great Britain. The correspondence was conducted by his brother, a jesuit, who acted as chaplain and secretary to the Spanish ambassador at the Hague. The British resident at that court having learned from the Spanish minister some secrets relating to England, even before they were imparted to him by the English ministry, was induced to set on foot an enquiry touching the source of this intelligence, and soon received information, that the secretary of the Spanish ambassador had a brother, a physician, at London. The suspicion occasioned by this circumstance being communicated to the ministry of England, Hensley was narrowly watched, and twenty-nine of his letters were intercepted. From the contents of these he was found guilty of having given the French court the first notice of the expedition to North America, the capture of the two ships the Alcide and Lys, the sailing and destination of every squadron and armament, and the difficulties that occurred in raising money for the service of the public. He had even acquainted them that the secret expedition of the foregoing year was designed against Rochefort; and advised a descent upon Great Britain, at a certain time and place, as the most effectual method of distressing the government, and affecting the public credit. After a long trial he was found guilty of treason, and received the sentence of death usually pronounced against such delinquents: but whether he merited forgiveness by some material discovery, or the ministry found him so insensible and insignificant that they were ashamed to take his life, he escaped execution, and was indulged with a pardon, on condition of going into perpetual exile.

The lash of the law fell, with no less justice, upon one Dr. Shebbeare, who, in a series of printed letters to the people of England, had censured the conduct of the ministry in the most acrimonious terms, stigmatized some great names with all the virulence of satire, and even presumed to insult and abuse the person of the sovereign. The government, enraged at the insolence, as well as alarmed at the success of this author, whose writings were bought with avidity by the public, determined to punish him severely for his arrogance and presumption; and he was apprehended by warrant from the Secretary's Office. His Sixth Letter to the People of England was pitched upon as the foundation of a prosecution.

After a short trial, in the court of King's Bench, he was found guilty of having writ the Sixth Letter to the People of England, which was adjudged a libellous pamphlet; sentenced to stand in the pillory, to pay a small fine, to be imprisoned three years, and give security for his good behaviour for the future: a punishment which, however seemingly severe, was by no means too great for the atrociousness of his crime; as his sole motive appeared to be to raise his own private fortune, which was low, at the expence of disturbing the peace of his country.

It must be observed to the honour of the English, and is universally allowed by all foreign nations, that no people in the world are more remarkable for exerting the virtues of charity and benevolence towards the distressed and forlorn part of their fellow-creatures. In the course of this year the public began to reap the benefit of several admirable institutions of this nature. Mr. Henry Raine, a private gentleman of Middlesex, had, in his life-time, built and endowed an hospital for the maintenance of forty poor maidens. By his will he bequeathed a certain sum of money to accumulate at interest, under the management of trustees, until the yearly produce should amount to two hundred and ten pounds, to be given in marriage portions to two of the maidens educated in his hospital, at the age of twenty-two, who should be the best recommended for piety and industry by the masters or mistresses whom they had served.

In the month of March the sum destined for this laudable purpose was completed, when the trustees, by public advertisement, summoned the maidens educated in the hospital to appear on a certain day, with proper certificates of their behaviour and circumstances, that six of the most deserving might be selected to draw lots for the prize of one hundred pounds, to be payed as her marriage portion, provided she married a man of an unblemished character, a member of the church of England, residing within certain specified parishes, and approved by the trustees. Accordingly on the first day of May the candidates appeared; and the prize being gained by one young woman, in presence of a numerous assembly of all ranks, attracted by curiosity, the other five maidens, with a sixth, added in lieu of her who had been successful, were marked for a second chance on the same day of the ensuing November, when a second prize of the same value would be presented. Thus a new candidate will be added every half year, that every maiden, who has been educated in this hospital, and been careful of her character, may have a chance for a portion of a hundred pounds, the other five being intended to defray the expence of the wedding entertainment. It is hard to say, which ought most to be admired,

Of no less, perhaps of still greater, merit was another charitable establishment, which also took place about the same time. A small number of humane persons, chiefly citizens of London, deeply affected with the calamitous situation of common prostitutes, who are certainly the most wretched of all human creatures, formed a generous resolution in their favour, such as will reflect eternal honour on the memory of the benefactors. They considered that many of those unhappy creatures, so miserable in themselves, and so productive of mischief to others, had been seduced to vice in their tender years by the perfidious artifice of the male sex, or the violence of unruly passion, before they had acquired experience to guard against the one, or sagacity to discern the fatal consequences of the other: that the jewel reputation being thus irretrievably lost, perhaps in one unguarded moment, they were covered with shame and disgrace, abandoned by their friends, shunned by their acquaintance, and thrown on the wide world: that stung with self-conviction, insulted with reproach, denied the privilege of penitence and contrition, cut off from all hope, impelled by indigence, and maddened by despair, they had plunged into a life of infamy, in which they were exposed to deplorable vicissitudes of misery, and the most excruciating pangs of reflection that any human beings could undergo: that whatever remorse they might feel, how much soever abhor their own vice or long for an opportunity of amendment, they were entirely destitute of all means of reformation: they were not only deprived of all possibility of profiting by those precious moments of repentance, and becoming again useful members of society; but, in order to earn a miserable subsistence, were obliged to persevere in the paths of prostitution, and act as the instruments of heaven's vengeance in propagating distemper and profligacy, in ruining the bodies and debauching the minds of their fellow creatures:

Moved to pity by these considerations, this virtuous band of associates resolved to provide a comfortable asylum for female penitents, to which they might fly for shelter from the receptacles of vice, the miseries of life, and the scorn of mankind; where they might indulge the salutary sentiments of remorse, make their peace with heaven, inure themselves to industry and temperance, and be profitably reunited to society, from which they had been so unhappily cut off. The plan of this excellent institution being formed, was put in execution by means of voluntary subscription, and the house opened in Goodman's fields, under the name of the Magdalen-hospital, in the month of August; when fifty petitions were presented by penitent prostitutes, soliciting admittance, which was granted to several. Another asylum was also opened by the hand of private charity, on the Surry-side of Westminster bridge, for the reception and education of female orphans, and children deserted by their parents: and it is to be hoped that the managers of both will be enabled, by the contributions of the humane and compassionate, to afford protection to every object labouring under under those species of distress which they propose to succour.

Nor did the generosity of the public appear more conspicuous in relieving the distressed, than in rewarding the ingenious in every particular branch of the liberal and useful arts and sciences. Several years had already elapsed since a society of private persons was instituted at London, for the encouragement of arts, manufactures, and commerce. It consisted of a president, vice-president, secretary, register, collector, and other officers, elected from a very considerable number of members, who paid a certain yearly contribution for the purposes of the institution. In the course of every year they held eight general meetings in a large assembly-room, built and furnished at the common expence; besides the ordinary meetings of the society held every week, from the second Wednesday in November to the last Wednesday of May: and, in the intermediate time, on the first and third Wednesday of every month.

At these ordinary meetings, provided the number then present exceeded ten, the members had a right to proceed upon business, and power to appoint such committees as they should think necessary. The money contributed by this association, after the necessary expence of the society had been deducted, was expended in premiums for planting and husbandry: for discoveries and improvements in chemistry, dying, and mineralogy; for promoting the ingenious arts of drawing, engraving, casting, painting, statuary and sculpture; for the improvement of manufactures and machines in the various articles of hats, crapes, druggets, mills, marbled paper, ship blocks, spinning-wheels, toys, yarn, knitting, and weaving.

They likewise allotted sums for the advantage of the British colonies in America; and bestowed premiums on those settlers who should excel in curing cochineal, planting logwood-trees, cultivating olive-trees, producing myrtle-wax, making pot-ash, preserving raisins, curing safflower, making silk and wines, importing sturgeon, preparing isinglass, planting hemp and cinnamon, extracting opium and the gum of the persimon-tree, collecting stones of the mango, which should be found to vegetate in the West-Indies; raising silk grass, and laying out provincial gardens. They moreover allowed a gold medal, in honour of him who should compose the best treatise on the arts of peace, containing an historical account of the progressive improvements of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce in the kingdom of England, with the effects of those improvements on the morals and manners of the people, and pointing out the most proper means for their future advancement. In a word, the society is so numerous, the contributions so considerable, the plan so judiciously laid, and executed with such discretion and spirit, as to promise much more effectual and extensive advantage to the public, than ever accrued from all the boasted academies of Christendom.

The artists of London had long maintained a private academy for improvement in the art of drawing from living figures; but, in order to extend this advantage, which was not attained without difficulty and expence, the duke of Richmond, a young nobleman of the most amiable character, provided a large apartment at White-hall for the use of those who studied the arts of painting, sculpture, and engraving; and furnished it with a collection of original plaster-casts from the best antique statues and busts at Rome and Florence. Here any learner had liberty to draw, or make models, under the eye and instruction of Mess. Wilton and Cipriani, two eminent artists; and twice a year the munificent founder bestowed premiums of silver medals on the four pupils who excelled the rest in drawing from a certain figure, and making the best model of it in basso-relievo.

Besides these liberal institutions, Mr. Finch and Mr. Townshend, animated with a laudable zeal for the improvement of learning, bestowed two prizes of fifteen guineas each upon two senior batchelors of arts, and the same upon two middle batchelors, in the university of Cambridge, who should compose the best exercises in Latin prose, to be recited in public.

It is commonly observed by foreign nations, and even admitted by the English themselves, that no country in the world produces such an infinite variety of original characters, nor gives birth to such a number of strange adventures. Of this nature may be reckoned the following incident relating to his grace the duke of Marlborough, which though it derived its origin from the latter end of the preceding year, and cannot properly be considered as belonging to general history, is yet so curious in all its particulars, that the reader, I imagine, will excuse the digression.

Towards the end of November, in the foregoing year, the abovementioned nobleman received, by the post, a letter directed "To his grace the duke of Marlborough, with care and speed," and conceived in these terms: "My lord, As ceremony is an idle thing upon most occasions, more especially to persons in my state of mind, I shall proceed immediately to acquaint you with the motive and end of addressing this epistle to you, which is equally interesting to us both. You are to know then, that my present situation in life is such, that I should prefer annihilation to a continuance in it. Desperate diseases require desperate remedies; and you are the man I have pitched upon, either to make me or unmake myself. As I never had the honour to live among the great, the tenor of my proposals will not be very courtly; but let that be an argument to enforce a belief of what I am now going to write. It has employed my invention for some time to find out a method of destroying another without exposing my own life: that I have accomplished, and defy the law. Now for the application of it. I am desperate, and must be provided for. You have it in your power: it is my business to make it your inclination to serve me; which you must determine to comply with, by procuring me a genteel support for my life, or your own will be at a period before this session of parliament is over. I have more motives than one for singling you out upon this occasion; and I give you this fair warning, because the means I shall make use of are too fatal to be eluded by the power of physic. If you think this of any consequence, you will not fail to meet the author on Sunday next, at ten in the morning, or on Monday (if the weather should be rainy on Sunday) near the first tree beyond the stile in Hyde-Park, in the foot-walk to Kensington. Secrecy and compliance may preserve you from a double danger of this sort, as there is a certain part of the world where your death has more than been wished for upon other motives. I know the world too well to trust this secret in any breast but my own. A few days determine me your friend or enemy. Felton*.— You will apprehend that I mean you should be alone; and depend upon it that a discovery of any artifice in this affair will be fatal to you. My safety is insured by my silence, for confession only can condemn me."

The duke, in consequence of this extraordinary summons, appeared at the time and place appointed. He was on horseback and alone, with pistols before him, and the star of his order displayed, that he might be the more easily known. He had likewise taken the precaution of engaging a friend to attend in the Park, though at such a considerable distance as scarce to be perceived. He remained some time on the spot without seeing any person whom he could suspect to be the author of the letter he had received, and then rode away; but happening to turn his head when he reached Hyde-Park corner, he observed a man standing at the bridge, and looking at the water, within twenty yards of the tree which had been fixed as the place of meeting. He forthwith rode back at a gentle pace, and passing the person, expected to be addressed; but as no advance of this kind was made, he, in repassing, bowed to the stranger, and asked, if he had not something to communicate. The man replying, "No, I don't know you;" the duke told his name, adding, "Now you know me, I imagine you have something to say to me." But he still answered in the negative, and the duke rode home.

In a day or two after this transaction another letter was brought to him, containing the following address; "My lord, you receive this as an acknowledgement of your punctuality, as to the time and place of meeting on Sunday last, though it was owing to you it answered no purpose. The pageantry of being armed, and the ensign of your order, were useless, and too conspicuous. You needed no attendant; the place was not calculated for mischief, nor was any intended. If you walk in the west isle of Westminster-abbey, towards eleven o'clock on Sunday next, your sagacity will point out the person, whom you will address, by asking his company to take a turn or two with you. You will not fail, on enquiry, to be acquainted with the name and place of abode; according to which direction, you will please send two or three hundred pound bank-notes the next day by the penny-post. Exert not your curiosity too early; it is in your power to make me grateful on certain terms. I have friends who are faithful; but they do not bark before they bite. I am, &c. F."

The duke, desirous of unravelling this strange mystery, repaired to the Abbey at the time prescribed; and after having walked up and down for five or six minutes, saw the very same person to whom he had spoke in Hyde-Park, enter the Abbey with another man of a creditable appearance. This last, after they had viewed some of the monuments, went into the choir; and the other turning back, advanced towards the duke, who accosting him, asked if he had any thing to say to him, or any commands for him? he replied, "No, my lord, I have not." "Sure you have," said the duke; but he persisted in his denial. Then the duke leaving him, took several turns in the isle, while the stranger walked on the other side. But nothing further passed between them; and although the duke had provided several persons in disguise to apprehend the delinquent, he forbore giving the signal, that, notwithstanding appearances, he might run no risque of injuring an innocent person.

Not long after this second disappointment, he received a third letter to the following effect: "My lord, I am fully convinced, that you had a companion on Sunday: I interpret it as owing to the weakness of human nature; but such proceeding is far from being ingenuous, and may produce bad effects, whilst it is impossible to answer the end proposed. You will see me again soon, as it were by accident, and may easily find where I go to: in consequence of which, by being sent to I shall wait on your grace: but expect to be quite alone and to converse in whispers: you will likewise give your honour, upon meeting, that no part of the conversation shall transpire. These, and the former terms complied with, ensure your safety: my revenge, in case of non-compliance, (or any scheme to expose me) will be slower, but not the less sure; and strong suspicion the utmost that can possibly ensue upon it, while the chances would be ten-fold against you. You will possibly be in doubt after the meeting, but it is quite necessary the outside should be a mask to the in. The family of the † Bloods is not extinct, though they are not in my scheme."

The expression, "you will see me again soon, as it were by accident," seemed evidently to point at the person to whom he had spoke in the Park and in the Abbey; nevertheless he saw him not again, nor did he hear any thing farther of the affair for two months; at the expiration of which the post brought him the following letter: "May it please your grace, I have reason to believe that the son of one Barnard, a surveyor in Abingdon-buildings, Westminster, is acquainted with some secrets that nearly concern your safety; his father is now out of town, which will give you an opportunity of questioning him more privately; it would be useless to your grace, as well as dangerous to me, to appear more publicly in this affair. Your sincere friend, Anonymous.---He frequently goes to Storey's-Gate coffee-house."

About ten days after the receipt of this letter, the duke sent a person to that coffee-house to enquire for Mr. Barnard, and tell him he would be glad to speak to him. The message was delivered to Mr. Barnard, who replied, he would wait on his grace next Thursday, half an hour after ten in the morning. He faithfully kept his promise, and no sooner appeared than the duke recognized him to be the person to whom he had spoke in the Park and the Abbey. Having led him into an apartment, and shut the door, he asked, as before, if he had any thing to impart; and was answered, as formerly, in the negative. Then the duke repeated every circumstance of this strange transaction; to which Barnard listened with attention and surprize, yet without exhibiting any marks of conscious guilt or confusion.

The duke observing, that it was matter of astonishment to see letters of such import written with the correctness of a scholar, the other replied, that a man might be very poor and very learned at the same time. When he saw the fourth letter, in which his name was mentioned, with the circumstance of his father's absence, he said, "It is very odd; my father was then out of town." This expression seemed the more remarkable, as the letter was without date; and he could not, as an innocent man, be supposed to know at what time it was written. The duke having informed him of every particular, added, that it behoved him, even more than his grace himself, to detect the writer of the letters, especially of the last, in which he was expressly named. To this admonition he returned no other answer but a smile, and then withdrew.

How these circumstances came to the knowledge of the public does not appear; but, soon after, Mr. Barnard was taken into custody, and tried at the Old Bailey, for sending a threatening letter, contrary to the statute. No evidence, however, could be produced to prove that the letters were of his hand-writing; nor could any presumption be said to lie against him, except his being in Hyde-Park and in Westminster-Abbey, at the place and time appointed in the two first letters.

On the other hand, Mr. Barnard proved, that on the Sunday when he saw the duke in Hyde-Park, he was on his way to Kensington on particular business, by his father's order, signified to him that very morning: that he accordingly went thither, and dined with his uncle, in company with several other persons, to whom he related what had passed between the duke of Marlborough and him in the Park: that his being afterwards in Westminster-Abbey was the effect of mere accident; that Mr. James Greenwood, his kinsman, a brewer at Deptford, who had lain the preceding night at his father's house, desired him to dress himself, that they might walk together in the Park; and he did not comply with this request till after much solicitation: that he proposed to enter the Park without passing through the Abbey, but was prevailed on by Mr. Greenwood, who expressed a desire of seeing the newly-erected monument of general Hargrave: that having formerly communicated to this friend the strange circumstance of the duke's speaking to him in Hyde-Park, Mr. Greenwood no sooner saw that nobleman in the Abbey than he gave notice to Mr. Barnard, who, as he was very short-sighted, did not see his grace; nor, if he had, could possibly have known him: that, from his passing them several times, Mr.

Greenwood concluded the duke wanted to speak with Mr. Barnard alone, and he therefore quitted him and retired into the choir, that they might have an opportunity of talking together privately. It likewise appeared, from undoubted evidence, that Barnard had often mentioned openly, to his friends and acquaintance, the circumstances of what passed between him and the duke in the Park and in the Abbey: that his father was a man of unblemished reputation, and in affluent circumstances: that he himself was never reduced to any want, or such exigence as might impel him to any desperate methods of obtaining money: that his fidelity had been often tried, and his life always irreproachable. For these reasons the jury were convinced of the prisoner's innocence, and he was therefore acquitted of the crime laid to his charge.

The fourth letter still remains an inscrutable mystery. No one could imagine, from Mr. Barnard's behaviour, "that he was acquainted with some secrets that nearly concerned the duke's safety;" nor could it be conceived why any person, who might have heard of his grace's having received threatening letters, should name that gentleman. The most natural conjecture, if on such an occasion a conjecture may be allowed, is, that some officious person, who might have received some slight intimation of the duke's business at the Abbey, and observed him speak to Mr. Barnard, might have followed that gentleman home, and taking it for granted that if he should, in consequence of this information, be detected in any evil design, he (the informer) whenever he should think proper to reveal himself, would be rewarded, might be induced to make the information at a venture, and in the mean time to remain incognito till the event should be known. With respect to the duke, he appears to have acted through the whole of this intricate affair with the utmost generosity and honour; to have undertaken the prosecution merely from public principles; and to have been more desirous that the prisoner should be found innocent than guilty.

In the month of August the king, in quality of elector of Hanover, having occasion for two hundred thousand pounds, a loan by subscription for that sum was opened at the Bank, and filled immediately by seven or eight money-dealers of London.

On the twenty-third day of November both houses of parliament met at Westminster, when, his majesty being indisposed, the session was opened by commission, and the lord-keeper addressed them to the following effect: He told them, his majesty had directed the lords of the commission to assure his parliament, that he always received the highest satisfaction in being able to lay before them any events that might promote the honour and interest of his kingdoms: that, in consequence of their advice, and enabled by the assistance which they unanimously gave, his majesty had exerted his endeavours to carry on the war in the most vigorous manner, in order to attain that desirable end, always to be wished, a safe and honourable peace: that it had pleased the Divine Providence to bless his measures and arms with success in several parts; and to make the enemies of the nation feel, that the strength of Great Britain is not to be provoked with impunity: that the conquest quest of the strong fortrefs of Louisbourg, with the islands of Cape Breton and St. John; the demolition of Frontenac, of the highest importance to his operations in America, and the reduction of Senegal, could not fail to bring great distress on the French commerce and colonies, and, in proportion, to procure great advantage to those of Great Britain: that France had also been made sensible, that whilst her forces were sent forth to invade and ravage the dominions of her neighbours, her own coasts were not inaccessible to his majesty's fleets and armies; a truth which she had experienced in the demolition of the works at Cherbourg, erected at a great expence, with a particular view to annoy England, as well as in the loss of a great number of ships and vessels; but that no treatment, however injurious to his majesty, could tempt him to make retaliation on the innocent subjects of that crown: that in Germany his majesty's good brother the king of Prussia, and prince Ferdinand of Brunswic, had found full employment for the armies of France and her confederates, from which the English operations, both by sea and in America, had derived the most evident advantage; their successes owing, under God, to their able conduct, and the bravery of his majesty's troops and those of his allies having been signal and glorious. The king, moreover, commanded them to declare, that the common cause of liberty and independency was still making noble and glorious efforts against the unnatural union formed to oppress it: that the commerce of his subjects, the source of national riches, had, by the vigilant protection received from his majesty's fleet, flourished in a manner not to be paralleled during such troubles. In this state of things, he said, the king in his wisdom thought it unnecessary to use many words to persuade them to bear up against all difficulties, effectually to stand by and defend his majesty, vigorously to support the king of Prussia and the rest of his majesty's allies, and to exert themselves to reduce their enemies to equitable terms of accommodation. He observed to the house of commons, that the uncommon extent of this war, in different parts, occasioned it to be uncommonly expensive: that the king had ordered them to declare to the commons, that he sincerely lamented, and deeply felt for the burdens of his people: that the several estimates were ordered to be laid before them; and that he desired only such supplies as should be requisite to push the war with advantage, and be adequate to the necessary services. In the last place, he assured them the king took so much satisfaction in that good harmony which subsisted among his faithful subjects, that it was more proper for him now to thank them for it than to repeat his exhortations to it: that this union, necessary at all times, was more especially so in such critical conjunctures; and his majesty doubted not but the good effects the nation had found from it would be the strongest motive to induce them to pursue it.

This speech was answered by loyal and affectionate addresses from both houses of parliament, who seemed fully satisfied with the conduct of the ministry. That of the lords was conceived in the following terms:

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, beg leave to approach your throne with hearts full of that duty and affection to your sacred person and government which become the most faithful subjects to the best of kings. That constant regard and attention which your majesty has shewn to the honour and interest of your kingdoms, have filled our minds with the most grateful sentiments; and we see with real satisfaction those active and vigilant efforts which your majesty, in your great wisdom, has made to carry on the war with vigour, in order to the desirable end which we all wish, a safe and honourable peace. Justice and good policy required that our enemies should feel how dangerous it is for them to provoke the spirit and strength of the British nation.

"We acknowledge, with becoming thankfulness, the goodness of the Divine Providence, in having crowned your majesty's measures and arms with success in several parts; and we joyfully congratulate your majesty on the conquest of the strong fortrefs of Louisbourg, with the islands of Cape Breton and St. John, the taking of Frontenac, and the reduction of Senegal. The high importance of these successes is apparent, in the reputation thereby acquired to your majesty's arms, and in the distress they cannot fail to bring upon the French commerce and colonies, as well as in the happy effects procured to those of Great Britain. We have seen, with the warmest emotions of resentment, the exorbitant devastations committed by the armies of France upon the dominions of your majesty, and those of your allies in Germany. They must now have experienced how much, in consequence of their unbounded ambition to invade their neighbours, their own coasts are exposed in the demolition of their expensive works at Cherbourg, particularly intended for the annoyance of this country; and in the loss of so many ships and vessels, as well privateers as others, in their ports.

"At the same time, we cannot sufficiently admire your majesty's magnanimity and moderation, in not having hitherto retaliated on the innocent subjects of that crown the injurious treatment which you have received. We have a just sense of the real advantages derived to the operations of Great Britain in particular, as well as to the common cause in general, from the wise conduct of the king of Prussia and prince Ferdinand of Brunswic. Their great abilities, and the bravery of your majesty's troops, and those of your majesty's allies, have been signally conspicuous in the successes with which they have been attended, and must be acknowledged by all Europe. Nothing can possibly be of greater national importance than the navigation and commerce of your subjects; and we return your majesty our dutiful thanks for that protection and security which they have received from your royal care in the disposition of your fleet, to which their present flourishing condition is so much owing. The stagnation of our enemy's trade, and the taking and destroying so many of their capital ships of war, ought, in this view, to be reckoned amongst the most happy events.

"Permit us to declare our grateful sense of that paternal tenderness which your majesty has expressed for the burthens of your people: we receive from thence the strongest encouragement to adhere

the more firmly to the cause of the protestant religion and public liberty, against any unnatural union formed to oppress it. In this just cause we will, to our utmost, effectually stand by and defend your majesty, support the king of Prussia and the rest of your allies, and vigorously exert ourselves to reduce our enemies to equitable terms of accommodation. Our duty and fidelity to your majesty, and our zeal for the protestant succession in your royal family, are uniform and unalterable: our prayers for the prolongation of your precious life and auspicious reign over us, are sincere and fervent; and we beg leave to give your majesty the strongest assurances, that nothing shall be wanting on our part to improve union and good harmony amongst all your subjects, for promoting and securing these interesting and essential objects."

The address of the commons, which was no less loyal, proceeded in the following strain:

"We your most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, return your majesty our most sincere and hearty thanks for the speech delivered, by your majesty's command, to both houses of parliament.

"We beg leave to congratulate your majesty, with hearts full of the most unfeigned joy, upon the many signal successes with which it has pleased Divine Providence to bless your majesty's measures and arms in several parts of the world; particularly, in the important conquest of the strong fortresses of Louisbourg, with the islands of Cape Breton and St. John; the taking of Frontenac, so essential to our operations in North America; the reduction of the valuable settlement of Senegal; the total demolition of the harbour and works of Cherbourg, erected at so great expence by the enemy, with a particular view to annoy this country; and the destruction of the shipping and privateers in the ports of France.

"Your majesty's faithful commons feel, with the highest satisfaction, how greatly these events redound to the honour and interests of your majesty's kingdoms, to the upholding the reputation of the British arms, and to the maintaining and extending the glories of your majesty's reign.

"We have the most lively sense of these happy consequences (under God) of your majesty's wisdom in the powerful exertion of the naval force of these kingdoms, to the annoyance and distress of the fleets, trade, and navigation of France, whilst the commerce of Great Britain flourishes in full protection and security; and, at the same time, of your majesty's justice and magnanimity, in steadily supporting your allies, and in carrying on with vigour, in all parts, this arduous and necessary war.

"It is with joy and admiration we see the glorious efforts made in Germany by your majesty's great ally the king of Prussia, and those made by prince Ferdinand of Brunswic, seconded by the valour of your majesty's troops and those of your allies; and that full employment has thereby been given to all the armies of France and of her confederates; from which our operations, both by sea and in America, have received the most evident and important advantages.

"Permit us to assure your majesty, that your faithful commons, justly animated in defence of the rights of your majesty's crown and of the protestant religion, and the common cause of liberty and independency, against the dangerous union which hath been formed to oppress them, will bear up against all difficulties, and exert themselves to the utmost, by granting to your majesty such supplies as shall be necessary, effectually to stand by and defend your majesty, and vigorously to support the king of Prussia, and the rest of your majesty's allies, firmly relying on the wisdom and goodness of your majesty, that the same will be applied, in the properest manner, to push the war with advantage, and to reduce the enemy to equitable terms of a safe, honourable, and lasting peace.

"We beg leave also to express our most grateful sense of the paternal satisfaction your majesty takes in that good harmony which subsists amongst your faithful subjects, and of your majesty's gracious acceptance of the universal zeal and affection of your people; which salutary union hath enabled us so effectually to exert our strength abroad, and hath preserved at home tranquillity, safety, and public credit; and we trust that the continuance of the same truly national spirit will, by the blessing of God, be attended with the like happy effects for the future."

The ministry, encouraged by this approbation of their conduct, resolved to prosecute the war in every quarter, and particularly to support the king of Prussia with still greater vigour than ever. With this view, on the seventh day of December a new treaty was concluded at London between that prince and the British nation, importing, that as the burthens of war in which the king of Prussia was engaged, laid him under the necessity of making fresh efforts to defend himself against the multitude of enemies who had attacked his dominions, he was obliged to take new measures with the king of England for their reciprocal defence and safety; and as his Britannic majesty had at the same time signified his earnest desire to strengthen the friendship subsisting between the two courts, and in consequence thereof to conclude a formal convention for granting to his Prussian majesty speedy and powerful assistance, their majesties had nominated and authorised their ministers to concert and settle the following articles:

All former treaties between the two crowns, particularly that signed at Westminster on the sixteenth of January, in the year 1756, and the convention of the eleventh of April, in the year 1758, are confirmed by the present convention in their whole tenor, as if they were herein inserted word for word. The king of Great Britain shall cause to be paid at London, to such person or persons as shall be authorised by the king of Prussia for that end the sum of four millions of rixdollars, making six hundred and seventy thousand pounds sterling, at one payment, immediately on the exchange of the ratifications, if the king of Prussia shall so require. His Prussian majesty shall employ the said sum in supporting and augmenting his forces, which shall act in such a manner as shall be of the greatest service to the common cause, and contribute most to the mutual defence and safety of their said majesties. The king of Great Britain, both as king and elector, and the king of Prussia, reciprocally bind themselves not to conclude, with the powers that have taken part in the present war, any treaty treaty of peace, truce, or other such like convention, but by common advice and consent, each expressly including therein the other. The ratifications of the present convention shall be exchanged within six weeks, or sooner, if possible.

The addresses of thanks were no sooner presented by both houses of parliament, than the commons proceeded to settle the supply. For this purpose two committees were forthwith established, and continued by adjournments to the month of May, by the twenty-third day of which all their resolutions were finished. They voted sixty thousand seamen, including fourteen thousand eight hundred and forty-five marines, for the service of the ensuing year; and for the operations by land, a body of troops amounting to fifty-three thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven effective men, including four thousand and eight invalids, besides the auxiliaries of Hanover, Hesse, Brunswick, Sax-Gotha, and Buckebourg, to the number of fifty thousand, and four battalions on the Irish establishment, in actual service in America and Africa. For the maintenance of the sixty thousand men employed in the sea-service, they granted three millions one hundred and twenty thousand pounds; for the land forces, one million two hundred fifty-six thousand one hundred and thirty pounds fifteen shillings and two pence; for the charge of the additional four battalions, forty thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine pounds thirteen shillings and nine-pence; for the pay of the general and staff officers, and hospitals of the land forces, fifty-two thousand four hundred and eighty-four pounds one shilling and eight pence; for maintaining the garrisons in the plantations, Gibraltar, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Providence, Cape Breton, and Senegal, the sum of seven hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and thirty-one pounds five shillings and seven pence; for the charge of ordnance for the land service, two hundred and twenty thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine pounds eleven shillings and nine pence; for extraordinary service performed by the same office, and not provided for by parliament in the course of the preceding year, three hundred twenty-three thousand nine hundred and eighty-seven pounds thirteen shillings and three-pence; for the ordinary of the navy, including half-pay to sea-officers, two hundred and thirty-eight thousand four hundred and ninety-one pounds nine shillings and eight pence; towards the support of Greenwich hospital, and for the out-pensioners of Chelsea-college, the sum of thirty-six thousand pounds.

They allotted for one year's expence, incurred by the foreign troops in the pay of Great-Britain, one million two hundred thirty-eight thousand one hundred and seventy-seven pounds nineteen shillings and ten pence, over and above sixty thousand pounds, for enabling his majesty to fulfil his engagements with the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, pursuant to the separate article of a new treaty concluded between them in the month of January of this current year, stipulating that this sum should be paid to his serene highness, in order to facilitate the means by which he might again fix his residence in his own dominions, and by his presence give fresh courage to his faithful subjects. Eighty thousand pounds were granted for enabling his majesty to discharge the like sum, raised in pursuance of an act passed in the preceding session, and charged upon the first aids or supplies to be granted in this session of parliament. The sum of two hundred thousand pounds was voted towards the building and repairing ships of war for the ensuing year. Fifteen thousand pounds were allowed for improving London-bridge; and forty thousand on account for the Foundling hospital. For the charge of transports to be employed in the course of the year, they assigned six hundred sixty-seven thousand seven hundred and twenty-one pounds nineteen shillings and seven pence: for maintaining the colonies of Nova Scotia and Georgia, they bestowed twenty-five thousand two hundred and thirty-eight pounds thirteen shillings and five pence. To replace sums taken from the sinking fund, thirty-three thousand two hundred and fifty-two pounds eighteen shillings and ten pence half-penny; for maintaining the British forts and settlements on the coast of Africa, ten thousand pounds; and for paying off the mortgage on an estate, devised for the endowment of a professorship in the university of Cambridge, the sum of twelve hundred and eighty pounds.

For the expence of the militia they voted ninety thousand pounds: for extraordinary expences relating to the land forces, incurred in the course of last year, and unprovided for by parliament, the sum of four hundred sixty-six thousand seven hundred and eighty-five pounds ten shillings five pence and three farthings. For the purchase of certain lands and hereditaments, in order to secure the king's docks at Portsmouth, Chatham, and Plymouth, they granted thirty-six thousand nine hundred and sixty-six pounds two shillings and ten pence. They voted two hundred thousand pounds for enabling his majesty to give proper compensations to the respective provinces in North America, for the expences they had incurred in levying and maintaining troops for the service of the public. They granted twenty thousand pounds to the East India company, towards enabling them to defray the expence of a military force in their settlements; and half that sum was granted for carrying on the fortifications to secure the harbour of Milford. To make good several sums issued by his majesty, for indemnifying the innholders and victuallers of Hampshire, for the expences they had incurred by quartering the Hessian auxiliaries in England; for an addition to the salaries of judges, and other less considerable purposes, they allowed the sum of twenty-six thousand one hundred and seventy-eight pounds sixteen shillings and six pence. Finally, they voted one million, upon account, for enabling the king to defray any extraordinary expence of the war, incurred, or to be incurred, for the service of the current year; and to take all such measures as might be necessary to disappoint or defeat any enterprizes or designs of his enemies, as the exigency of affairs should require.

The sum of all the grants voted by the committee of supply, amounted to twelve millions seven hundred sixty-one thousand three hundred and ten pounds nineteen shillings and five-pence.

The funds allotted for raising this supply, consisted of the land tax at four shillings in the pound, the malt tax continued, and the following expedients. They resolved, that the annuities at three per centum, amounting to three millions one hundred thousand pounds, granted in the year 1757, should be, with the consent of the several proprietors, added to the joint-stock of three per centum transferable annuities at the bank of England, consolidated by the acts passed in the twenty-fifth, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth years of his majesty's reign, and the charges and expences thereof to be charged upon the sinking-fund until redemption by parliament; and that all such persons as should not, before the fifth of April next, signify their dissent, in books to be opened at the Bank for that purpose, should be deemed assenting to this proposal. They further resolved, that all the moneys, which might arise, after the fifth day of January, from the produce of the additional stamp-duties on pamphlets, printed papers, coals exported, the surplus of the new duty on licences for retailing wine and spirituous liquors, which were constituted a fund for paying three per cent. per annum at the Bank, on three millions borrowed, by virtue of an act passed in the thirtieth year of his majesty's reign, towards the supply of the year 1757; as also the annuities on single lives, payable at the receipt of the Exchequer, in respect of the same, should be added to the sinking-fund.

They resolved, that six millions six hundred thousand pounds should be raised by transferable annuities, after the rate of three pounds per cent. per annum; and that an additional capital of fifteen pounds should be added to every hundred pounds advanced; which additional capital should consist of ten pounds, given in a lottery-ticket to each subscriber, and of five pounds in like transferable annuities at three pounds per cent: the blanks and prizes of the lottery to be attended with like annuities, after the rate of three pounds per cent. per annum, to commence from the fifth day of January, in the year 1760: that the sum of six millions six hundred thousand pounds, together with the said additional capital of five pounds per cent, amounting to three hundred and thirty thousand pounds, making in the whole six millions nine hundred and thirty thousand pounds, should bear interest after the rate of three per cent, to commence on the fifth day of July next ensuing: that these annuities should be transferable at the bank of England, and charged upon a fund established for that purpose in this session of parliament, for which the sinking-fund should be a collateral security, redeemable by parliament in the whole, or in part, by sums not less than five hundred thousand pounds at one time, six months notice having been first given of such payments respectively: that the lottery should consist of tickets valued at ten pounds each, in a proportion not exceeding eight blanks to a prize, each blank to be valued at six pounds. They resolved, that every subscriber should, on or before the thirteenth day of February, make a deposit of fifteen per centum, on such sum as he should chuse to subscribe towards raising the six millions six hundred thousand pounds, with the cashiers of the bank of England, as a security for his making the future payments on or before the times limited by the act: that the several sums so received should by the cashiers, be payed into the receipt of his majesty's Exchequer, to be applied from time to time, to such services as the Commons should then have voted, and not for any other purpose: that any subscriber, paying the whole, or any part of his subscription, previous to the days appointed for the respective payments, should be allowed a discount, after the rate of three pounds per cent. per annum, from the days of such respective payments to the times prescribed.

They resolved, that a subsidy of one shilling in the pound should be imposed on all tobacco, foreign linens, sugar, and other grocery, East-India commodities, foreign brandy, spirits, and paper imported into Great-Britain, according to the value settled on each commodity by the several books of rates, on any acts of parliament, over and above the present duties charged upon these articles. They laid an additional inland duty of one shilling per pound upon all coffee sold in Great-Britain, by wholesale or retail; and another of ninepence per pound upon chocolate, over and above the former inland duty, and all customs payed on its importation. They resolved, that such part of the hundred thousand pounds, granted in the last session, towards defraying the expence of the militia, as remained in the Exchequer, after satisfaction of that expence, should be issued and applied towards raising the supply granted in this session: that, after the fifth day of July, in the current year, any person might trade in any goods or wares, in which the quantity of gold, in any one separate piece, should not exceed two penny weights, or the quantity of silver be under five penny weights, without being liable to take out a licence for that purpose; but that, from the same date, every person selling gold or silver plate, or goods in which gold or silver is manufactured, and the quantity of gold in one distinct piece should amount to two ounces or upwards, should pay five pounds for an annual licence, instead of the forty shillings formerly payable for this purpose; and that all pawn-brokers, refiners, and others, trading in gold and silver plate, should be obliged to take out this new annual licence; the sums thus raised to be applied to the same uses and purposes, to which the sums charged on licences by an act of last session were applicable.

They ordained, that the act to settle the trade to Africa, passed in the reign of William the third, for allowing during a limited time, a drawback of the duties upon the exportation of copper bars imported, with a proviso continued by several successive acts, and now near expiring, should be further protracted: that so much of an act, passed in the eighth year of George the first, for encouraging the silk manufacture of the kingdom, as relates to this encouragement, and to taking off several duties on merchandize exported, should likewise be continued. They moreover voted the continuation of so much of an act passed in the second year of George the second, for the better preservation of his majesty's woods in America, as related to the premium upon masts, yards, and bowsprits, tar, pitch, and turpentine. They resolved, that the act for encouraging the growth of coffee in the American plantations, and another for the more effectual securing the duties on foreign made sail-cloth imported into the kingdom, should be continued. They determined, that the sums remaining in the receipt of exchequer, disposable by parliament, amounting to the sum of two hundred fifty-three thousand three hundred and eighty-four pounds and eleven pence, should be applied towards making good the supply granted in this session. They resolved, that the duties payable upon raw short silk or capiton, and silk nubs or husks, should, after the fifth day of July, cease and determine; but, in lieu thereof, that the same duties should be payed upon the importation of these articles, as were payed upon raw long silk imported, and applied to the same purposes.

Towards the present supply they likewise granted the sum of one hundred thousand pounds, repayed into the receipt of the Exchequer, being the sum which was voted in the year 1755, for enabling the king to fulfil his engagements with the empress of Russia. For defraying the expence incurred by the additional salaries granted to the judges, they imposed an additional stamp-duty of sixpence upon every piece of vellum or parchment, or sheet or piece of paper, on which should be engrossed or written any affidavit used at any court of law or equity at Westminster, or in the courts of the great sessions in Wales, or county-palatine of Chester, except affidavits taken pursuant to several acts made in the 30th and 32d years of the reign of Charles II. for burying in woollen; and except such affidavits as should be taken before the officers of the customs, or any justice of the peace, or commissioners appointed by act of parliament for assessing or levying aids or duties granted to his majesty, which affidavits should be taken by the said officers of the customs, justices, or commissioners, by virtue of their authority, as justices of the peace, or commissioners, respectively. This additional stamp-duty was charged on all affidavits read and filed in the aforesaid courts of judicature; on all paper and vellum used for common bail, rules, or orders, copies of rules or orders, original writs, subpoenas, process or mandate that should issue from or pass the seals of any of the courts of Westminster, courts of the great sessions in Wales, courts in the counties palatine, or any other court whatever holding plea, where the debt or damage amounts to forty shillings or above, or the thing demanded is of that value; excepting, however, writs of covenant for levying fines, writs of entry for suffering common recoveries, and writs of habeas corpus.

They moreover established an additional stamp-duty of one penny upon every sheet of paper or piece of vellum used for depositions taken in the court of Chancery, or other court of equity at Westminster, (except the paper draughts of depositions taken by virtue of any commission before they are engrossed) for copies of bills, answers, pleas, demurrers, replications, rejoinders, interrogatories, depositions, or other proceedings whatsoever, in this or any other court of judicature in England or Wales. The augmentation of salaries granted to the judges in Scotland was charged upon the duties and revenues collected in that part of Great Britain.

Finally the commons resolved, that the sum of two millions two hundred and fifty thousand pounds should be issued out of the sinking-fund towards the supply of the current year; and one million raised by exchequer bills, chargeable on the first aids to be granted in the next session of parliament. These resolutions were immediately digested into bills, which, soon after, received the royal sanction.

On the twenty-second day of May, Mr. secretary Pitt delivered a message from his majesty, importing, that his majesty, relying on the experienced zeal and affection of his faithful commons, and considering that, in this critical conjuncture, emergencies might arise, which might be of the utmost importance, and be attended with the most pernicious consequences, if proper means should not immediately be applied to prevent or defeat them, was desirous that this house would enable him to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred, or to be incurred, for the service of the year 1759, and to take all such measures as might be necessary to disappoint or defeat any enterprizes or designs of his enemies, and as the exigencies of affairs might require.

This message was no sooner read, than a motion was made, and unanimously approved, that it should be referred to the committee, who forthwith formed upon it the resolution, whereby one million was granted, to be raised by loans, or exchequer bills, chargeable on the first aids that should be given in the next session. This produced a bill enabling his majesty to raise the sum of one million, for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, comprehending a clause, allowing the bank of England to advance, on the credit of the loan therein mentioned, any sum not exceeding a million, notwithstanding the act of the fifth and sixth years in the reign of William and Mary, by which the bank was established.

The bills relating solely to the supply being finally established, the house proceeded, as usual, to enact other laws for the benefit of the public. Petitions having been presented by the cities of Bristol and New Sarum, alledging, that, since the laws prohibiting the making of low wines and spirits from grain, meal, and flour, had been in force, the commonalty appeared more sober, healthy, and industrious; representing the ill consequences which they apprehended would attend the repeal of these laws, and therefore praying their continuance; a committee of the whole house resolved, that the prohibition to export corn should be continued to the twenty-fourth day of December, in the year 1759; subject, nevertheless, to such provisions for shortening the said term of its continuance as should hereafter be made by any act of that session, or by his majesty with the advice of his privy council, during the recess of parliament: that the act for discontinuing the duties upon corn and flour imported, or brought in as prize, was not proper to be further continued: and that the prohibition to make low wines or spirits from any sort of grain, meal, or flour, should be continued to the twenty-fourth day of December, in the year 1759.

Before a bill was framed on these resolutions, a remonstrance was presented by a great number of the malt-distillers of the city and suburbs of London, as well as by several farmers in the county of Norfolk, complaining of the hardships and losses they must sustain, should the bill pass into a law.

However,

However, notwithstanding their remonstrances were carefully examined, the bill passed, with the amendments.

Repeated complaints having been made to the government by neutral nations, especially the Dutch, that their ships had been plundered, and their crews maltreated, by some of the English privateers, the legislature resolved to provide effectually against any such outrageous practices for the future; and with this view the commons ordered a bill to be brought in, for amending and explaining an act of the twenty-ninth year of his present majesty's reign, entitled, An act for the encouragement of seamen, and more speedy and effectual manning of his majesty's navy; which soon after received the royal assent, and contained the following regulations: That, after the first day of January in the present year, no commission should be granted to a privateer in Europe under the burden of one hundred tons, the force of ten carriage guns, being three pounders or above, with forty men at the least, unless the lords of the admiralty, or persons authorized by them, should think fit to grant the same to any ship of inferior force or burthen, the owners thereof giving such bail or security as should be prescribed: that the lords of the admiralty might at any time revoke, by an order in writing under their hands, any commission granted to a privateer; this revocation being subject to an appeal to his majesty in council, whose determination should be final: that, previous to the granting any commission, the persons proposing to be bound and give security should severally make oath of their being respectively worth more money than the sum for which they were then to be bound, over and above the payment of all their just debts: that persons applying for such commissions should make application in writing, and therein set forth a particular and exact description of the vessel, specifying the burthen, and the number and nature of the guns on board, to what place belonging, as well as the name or names of the principal owner or owners, and the number of men; these particulars to be inserted in the commission, and every commander to produce such commission to the custom-house officer, who should examine the vessel, and, finding her answer the description, give a certificate thereof gratis, to be deemed a necessary clearance, without which the commander should not depart: that if, after the first day of June, any captain of a privateer should agree for the ransom of any neutral vessel, or the cargo, or any part thereof, after it should have been taken as prize, and in pursuance of such agreement should actually discharge such prize, he should be deemed guilty of piracy; but that, with respect to contraband merchandize, he might take it on board his own ship, with the consent of the commander of the neutral vessel, and then set her at liberty; and that no person should purloin or embezzle the said merchandize before condemnation: that no judge or other person belonging to any court of admiralty should be concerned in any privateer: that owners of vessels, not being under fifty, or above one hundred tons, should, after their commissions were declared void, be indemnified for their loss by the public: that a court of oyer and terminer, and gaol delivery, for the trial of offences committed within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, should be held twice a-year in the Old Bailey at London, or in such other place within England as the board of admiralty should appoint: that the judge of any court of admiralty, after an appeal interposed, as well as before, should, at the request of the captor or claimant, issue an order for appraising the capture, when the parties could not agree upon the value, and an inventory to be taken; then exact security for the full value, and cause the capture to be delivered to the person giving such security: but should objection be made to the taking such security, the judge should, at the request of either party, order such merchandize to be entered, landed, and sold at public auction, and the produce be deposited at the Bank, or in some public securities; and in case of security being given, the judge should grant a pass in favour of the capture; and finally, that this act should remain in force only during the continuance of the present war with France.

From this regulation it is evident, that whatever outrages might have been offered to the ships of neutral nations, they were by no means encouraged by the legislature, or the body of the people.

The attention of the commons was next engaged by an object of no less importance to the public. This was the regular establishment of the militia, which, notwithstanding the endeavours of the legislature, was found still incomplete, and in want of further assistance from the government. His majesty having, by the chancellor of the Exchequer, recommended to the house the making suitable provision for defraying the charges of the militia during the current year, the accounts of the expence already incurred by this establishment were laid before the committee of supply, who, after having duly examined them, resolved, that ninety thousand pounds should be granted on account, towards providing pay and cloathing for the militia, from the last day of the last year to the twenty-fifth day of March, in the year 1760, and for refunding to the king a sum advanced for this service.

Leave was given to bring in one bill agreeable to this resolution, and another to enforce the execution of the laws relating to the militia, remove certain difficulties, and prevent the inconveniences with which it might be attended. So eager were the majority in both houses for accomplishing this national measure, that they not only carried both bills to the throne, where they received the royal sanction; but they presented an address to the king, desiring his majesty would give directions to his lieutenants of the several counties, ridings, and places in England, to use their utmost diligence and attention for carrying into execution the several acts of parliament relating to the militia.

The mutiny-bill, and that for the regulation of the marine forces while on shore, passed through the usual forms, as annual measures, without any dispute or opposition.

A committee having been appointed to enquire what laws were expired, or near expiring, and to report their opinion to the house touching the revival or continuation of these laws, they agreed to several resolutions; in consequence of which the following bills were brought in, and enacted into laws, namely, an act for regulating the lastage and ballastage of the river Thames; an act for continuing the law relating to the punishment of persons going armed or disguised; an act for continuing several laws near expiring; an act concerning the admeasurement of coals; and an act for the relief of debtors, with respect to the imprisonment of their persons. This last, among other particulars, ordained, that where more creditors than one shall charge any prisoner in execution, and desire to have him detained in prison, they shall only respectively pay him each such weekly sum, not exceeding one shilling and six-pence a-week, as the court, at the time of his being remanded, shall direct: and that if any prisoner, described by the act, shall remain in prison three months after being committed, any creditor may compel him to give into court, upon oath, an account of his real and personal estate, to be disposed of for the benefit of his creditors, they consenting to his being discharged.

In the course of this session a bill was passed, permitting the free importation of cattle from Ireland for a limited time; as was also an act allowing the free importation of tallow from that kingdom, for the term of five years.

In the month of February the commons presented an address to his majesty, requesting that he would give directions for laying before the house an account of what had been done, since the beginning of last year, towards securing the harbour of Milford, in pursuance of any directions from his majesty. These accounts being examined, and the king having, by the chancellor of the Exchequer, exhorted them to make provision for fortifying the said harbour, a bill was brought in to explain, amend, and render more effectual, the act of the last session relating to this subject; and passing through both houses, received the royal assent without opposition. By this act several engineers were added to the commissioners formerly appointed; and it was ordained, that fortifications should be erected at Peter-church point, Westlanyon-point, and Neyland-point, as being the most proper and best situated places for fortifying the interior parts of the harbour. It was also enacted, that the commissioners should appoint proper secretaries, clerks, assistants, and other officers, for carrying the two acts into execution; and that an account of the application of the money should be laid before the parliament within twenty days of the opening of every session.

The next object that engaged the attention of the commons was an affair of a very delicate nature, of the utmost importance to the commerce of the kingdom, and which equally affected the interest of the nation and the character of the natives. In the latter end of February complaint was made to the house, that, since the commencement of the war, an infamous traffic had been set on foot by some merchants of London, of importing French cloths into several ports of the Levant, on account of British subjects. Five persons were ordered to attend the house; and the fact was clearly proved, not only by their evidence, but also by some papers delivered to the house by the Turkey company. A bill was immediately framed for putting a stop to this scandalous practice, declaring in the preamble, that such traffic was not only a manifest discouragement and prejudice to the woollen manufactures of Great Britain, but also an advantage to the enemy; in consequence of which they were enabled to maintain the war against these kingdoms. This act, however, was only to continue in force during the present war with France.

The commons then proceeded to explain and amend a law made in the last session, for granting to his majesty several rates and duties upon offices and pensions. The directions given in the former act for levying this imposition having been found inconvenient in many respects, new regulations were now established, importing, that those deductions should be paid into the hands of receivers appointed by the king for that purpose: that all sums deducted under this act should be accounted for to such receivers, and the accounts audited and passed by them, and not by the auditors of the imprests or the Exchequer: that all disputes relating to the collection of this duty should be finally, and in a summary way, determined by the barons of the Exchequer in England and Scotland respectively: that the commissioners of the land-tax should fix and ascertain the sum total or amount of the perquisites of every office and employment within their respective districts, distinct from the salary thereunto belonging, to be deducted under the said act, independently of any former valuation or assessment of the same to the land-tax; and should rate or assess all offices and employments whereof the perquisites should be found to exceed the sum of one hundred pounds per annum, at one shilling for every twenty thence arising; that the receivers should transmit to the commissioners in every district where any office or employment is to be assessed, an account of such offices and employments, that, upon being certified of the truth of their amount, they might be rated and assessed accordingly: that, in all future assessments of the land-tax, the said offices and employments should not be valued at higher rates than those at which they were assessed towards the land-tax of the thirty-first year of the present reign: that the word perquisite should be understood to mean such profits of offices and employments as arise from fees established by custom or authority, and payable either by the crown or the subjects, in consideration of business done in the course of executing such offices and employments: and that a commissioner possessed of any office or employment might not interfere in the execution of the said act, except in what might relate to his own employment. By the four last clauses several salaries are exempted from the payment of this duty.

Nothing surely could be more reasonable than such a law, by which those who receive so much from the bounty of the government were obliged to contribute something towards its support and defence. It were to be wished, indeed, that the salaries and perquisites of many of the public offices were infinitely less than they are at present; as this would probably be the most effectual means of preventing those violent contests among the courtiers for places, which so often disturb the internal tranquillity of the kingdom, and which owe their rise not so much to any regard which the candidates have for the interest of their country, as to the desire of encreasing their own private fortunes.

In the beginning of March petitions were delivered to the house by the merchants of Birmingham in Warwickshire, and Sheffield in Yorkshire, representing, that the toy-trade of these and many other towns consisted generally of articles in which gold and silver might be said to be manufactured, though in small proportion, inasmuch as the sale of them depended upon slight ornaments of gold and silver: that, by a clause passed in the last session of parliament, obliging every person who should sell goods or wares, in which any gold or silver was manufactured, to take out an annual licence of forty shillings, they the petitioners were laid under great difficulties and disadvantages: that not only the first seller, but every person thro' whose hands the goods or wares passed to the consumer, was required to take out the said licence. They therefore prayed that the house would take these hardships and inequalities into consideration, and indulge them with such relief as to the house should seem proper.

The committee, to whom this affair was referred, having resolved, that this imposition was found prejudicial to the toy and cutlery trade of the kingdom, the house agreed to the resolution; and a bill being prepared, under the title of "An act to amend the act made in the last session, for repealing the duty granted by an act of the sixth year in the reign of his late majesty on silver plate, and for granting a duty on licences to be taken out by all persons dealing in gold and silver plate," was enacted into a law by the royal sanction. By this new regulation, small quantities of gold and silver plate were allowed to be sold without licence. Instead of the duty before payable upon licences, another was granted to be taken out by certain dealers in gold and silver plate, pawnbrokers, and refiners.

This affair being finished, the house took into consideration the claims of the proprietors of lands, purchased for the better securing of his majesty's docks, ships, and stores, at Chatham, Portsmouth, and Plymouth; and for better fortifying the town of Portsmouth and citadel of Plymouth, in pursuance of an act passed in the last session. We have already mentioned the sum granted for this purpose, in consequence of a resolution of the house, upon which a bill being founded, soon passed into a law without opposition.

The next bill which was introduced into the house related to the summons issued by the commissioners of the excise and justices of the peace, for the appearance of persons offending against, or for forfeitures incurred by, the laws of excise. As some doubts had occurred with respect to the method of summoning in such cases, this bill, which afterwards received the royal assent, enacted, that summons left at the house, or usual place of residence, or with the wife, child, or menial servants of the person so summoned, should be held as legal notice, as well as the leaving such notice at the house, workhouse, warehouse, shop, cellar, vault, or usual place of residence of such person, directed to him by his right or assumed name; and all dealers in coffee, tea, or chocolate, were subjected to the penalty of twenty pounds as often as they should neglect to attend the commissioners of excise, when summoned in this manner.

In the month of April a bill was prepared for the more effectual preventing the fraudulent importation of cambricks; and while it was under consideration, several merchants and wholesale drapers of the city of London presented a petition, explaining the grievances to which they and many thousands of other traders would be subjected, should the bill, as it then stood, be passed into a law. According to their request, they were heard by their council on the justice of this remonstrance; and some alterations were made to the bill in their favour. At length it was carried to the throne, and enacted into a law, to the following purport: That no cambricks, French lawns, or linens of this kind, usually entered under the denomination of cambrics, should be imported after the first day of next August, but in bales, cases, or boxes, covered with sackcloth or canvas, containing each one hundred whole pieces, or two hundred half pieces, on penalty of forfeiting the whole: that cambrics and French lawns should be imported for exportation only, lodged in the king's warehouse, and delivered out under like security and restrictions, as prohibited East India merchandize; and, on importation, pay only the half duty: that all cambrics and French lawns in the custody of any persons should be deposited, by the first of August, in the king's warehouses, the bonds thereupon be delivered up, and the drawback on exportation paid; yet the goods should not be delivered out again but for exportation: that cambrics and French lawns exposed to sale, or found in possession of private persons after the said day, should be forfeited, and liable to be searched for and seized, in like manner as other prohibited and unaccustomed goods are; and the offender should forfeit two hundred pounds, over and above all other penalties and forfeitures inflicted by any former act: that, if any doubt should arise concerning the species or quality of the goods, or the place where they were manufactured, the proof should lie on the owner: finally, that the penalty of five pounds inflicted by a former act, and payable to the informer, on any person that should wear any cambric or French lawns, should still remain in force, and be recoverable, on conviction, by oath of one witness, before one justice of the peace.

The last bill passed in the course of this session, was that relating to the augmentation of the salaries of the judges in his majesty's superior courts of justice. A motion having been made for an instruction to the committee of supply to consider of the said augmentation, the chancellor of the Exchequer acquainted the house that this augmentation was recommended to them by his majesty. Nevertheless, the motion was opposed, and a warm debate ensued. At length, however, being carried in the affirmative, the committee agreed to certain resolutions, which were approved by the house, and digested into a bill. While this remained under deliberation, a motion was made for an instruction to the committee, that they should have power to receive a clause or clauses for restraining the judges, comprehended within the provisions of the bill, from receiving any fee, gift, present, or entertainment, from any city, town, borough, or corporation, or from any sheriff, gaoler, or other officer, upon their several respective circuits, and from taking any gratuity from any office or officer of any of the courts of law. Another motion was made for a clause restraining such judges, barons, and justices, as were comprehended within the provisions of the bill, from interfering otherwise than by giving their own votes, in any election of members to serve in parliament; but both these proposals being put to the vote, were carried in the negative. These two motions being over-ruled by the majority, the bill underwent some alterations; and having passed through both houses in the ordinary course, was enacted into a law by the royal sanction. With respect to the import of this act, it is no other than the establishment of the several stamp-duties applied to the augmentation; and the appropriation of their produce in such a manner, that the crown cannot alter the application of the sums thus granted in parliament.

Beside the bills I have already mentioned, several others were introduced into the house, all of which, in the end proved abortive; and the commons deliberated on many other important subjects, which however were not brought to any kind of maturity. In the beginning of the session, a committee being appointed to resume the enquiry concerning the regulation of weights and measures, a subject I have mentioned in the history of the preceding session, the box, which contained a Troy pound weight, locked up by order of the house, was again produced by the clerk, in whose custody it had been deposited. This affair being carefully examined, the committee agreed to certain resolutions*, upon which a future law may possibly be founded. In the mean time, it was ordered that all the weights referred to in the report should be delivered to the clerk of the house, to be locked up and brought forth again occasionally.

The commons likewise, among other articles of domestic œconomy, bestowed some attention on the hospital for foundlings, which was now, more than ever, become a matter of national consideration. The accounts relating to this charity having been laid before the members, were, together with the king's recommendation, referred to the committee of supply, where they procured the sum of money which I have already mentioned among the other grants of the year. The commons afterwards resolved themselves into a committee, to deliberate on the state of the hospital, and examine its accounts. On the third day of

* The reader, perhaps, may not be displeased with a sight of these resolutions, which I have therefore inserted. They implied, that the ell ought to contain one yard and one quarter, according to the yard mentioned in the third resolution of the former committee upon the subject of weights and measures: that the pole, or perch, should contain in length five such yards and a half; the furlong two hundred and twenty; and the mile one thousand seven hundred and sixty: that the superficial perch should contain thirty square yards and a quarter; the rood one thousand two hundred and ten; and the acre four thousand eight hundred and forty: that, according to the fourth, fifth, and sixth resolutions of the former committee, upon the subject of weights and measures, agreed to by the house on the second day of June in the preceding year, the quart ought to contain seventy cubical inches and one half; the pint thirty-five and one quarter; the peck five hundred and sixty-four; and the bushel two thousand two hundred and fifty-six: that the several parts of the pound, mentioned in the eighth resolution of the former committee, examined and adjusted in presence of this committee, examined and adjusted in presence of this committee, viz. the half pound or six ounces, quarter of a pound or three ounces, two ounces, one ounce, two half ounces, the five penny weight, three penny weight, two penny weight, and one penny weight; the twelve grains, six grains, three grains, two grains, and two of one grain each, ought to be the models of the several parts of the said pound, and to be used for sizing or adjusting weights for the future: that all weights exceeding a pound should be of brass, copper, bell-metal, or cast iron; and that all those of cast iron should be made in the form, and with a handle of hammered iron, such as the pattern herewith produced, having the mark of the weight cast in the iron; and all weights of a pound, or under, should be of gold, silver, brass, copper, or bell-metal: that all weights of cast iron should have the initial letters of the name of the maker upon the upper bar of the handle; and all other weights should have the same, together with the mark of the weight, according to the standard, upon some convenient part thereof: that the yard, mentioned in the second resolution of the former committee, upon the subject of weights and measures, agreed to by the house in the last session, being the standard of length; and the pound, mentioned in the eighth resolution, being the standard of weight, ought to be deposited in the court of the receipt of the Exchequer, and there safely kept, under the seals of the chancellor of the said Exchequer, and of the chief baron, and the seal of office of the chamberlain of the Exchequer, and not to be opened but by the order and in the presence of the chancellor of the Exchequer and chief baron for the time being: that the most effectual means to ascertain uniformity in measures of length and weight, to be used throughout the realm, would be to appoint certain persons, at one particular office, with clerks and workmen under them, for the purpose only of sizing and adjusting, for the use of the subjects, all measures of length, and all weights, being parts, multiples, or certain proportions of the standards to be used for the future: that a model or pattern of the said standard yard, mentioned in the second resolution of the former committee, and now in custody of the clerk of the house, and a model or pattern of the standard pound, mentioned in the eighth resolution of that committee, together with models or patterns of the parts of the said pound, now presented to the house, and also of the multiples of the said pound, mentioned in this report (when the same are adjusted) should be kept in the said office, in custody of the said persons to be appointed for sizing weights and measures, under the seal of the chief baron of the Exchequer for the time being, to be opened only by order of the said chief baron, in his presence, or the presence of one of the barons of the Exchequer, on the application of the said persons for the purpose of correcting and adjusting, as occasion should require, the patterns or models used at the said office, for sizing measures of length and weight, delivered out to the subjects: that the models or patterns of the said standard yard, and standard pound aforesaid, and also models or patterns of the parts and multiples aforesaid of the pound, should be lodged in the said office for the sizing of such measures of lengths or weights, as being parts, multiples, or proportions of the said standards, should hereafter be required by any of his majesty's subjects: that all measures of length and weight, sized at the said office, should be marked, in some convenient place thereof, with such marks as should be thought expedient, to shew the identity of the measures and weights sized at the said office, and to discover any frauds that may be committed therein: that the said office should be kept within a convenient distance of the court of Exchequer at Westminster; and that all measures of length and weights, within a certain distance of London, should be corrected and re-assized, as occasion should require, at the said office: that in order to enforce uniformity in weights and measures to be used for the future, all persons appointed by the crown to act as justices of the peace, in any county, city, or town corporate, being respectively counties within themselves, throughout the realm, should be empowered to hear and determine, and put the law in execution, in respect to weights and measures only, without any of them being obliged to sue out a dedimus, or to act in any other matter; and the said commissioners should be empowered to sue, imprison, inflict, or mitigate, such penalties as should be thought proper; and have such other authorities as should be necessary for compelling the use of weights and measures, agreeable to the foresaid standards: that models or patterns of the said standard yard and pound, and of the parts and multiples thereof, before-mentioned, should be distributed in each county, in such a manner as to be readily used for evidence, in all cases where measures and weights should be questioned before the said commissioners, and for adjusting the same in a proper manner.

May their resolutions were reported, to the following effect: That the appointing, by the governors and guardians of the said hospital, places in the several counties, ridings, or divisions, in this kingdom, for the reception of exposed and deserted young children, would be attended with evil consequences; and that the conveying of children from the country to the said hospital was attended with many evil consequences, and ought to be prevented. A bill was ordered to be prepared agreeable to this last resolution, but never drawn up, and therefore productive of no effect.

To the view I have exhibited of the proceedings in parliament, it may not be amiss to subjoin some messages which were sent by the king to the house of commons. That relating to the vote of credit I have already mentioned in the account of the supply. On the twenty-sixth day of April the chancellor of the Exchequer presented to the house two messages, signed by his majesty; one in favour of his subjects in North America, and the other in behalf of the East India company. In the former, he recommended to their consideration the zeal and vigour with which his faithful subjects in North America had exerted themselves in defence of his just rights and possessions; desiring he might be enabled to give them a proper compensation for the expences incurred by the respective provinces in levying, cloathing, and paying the troops raised in that country, according as the active vigour and strenuous efforts of the several colonies should appear to merit. In the latter, he desired the house would empower him to assist the East India company in defraying the expence of a military force in the East Indies, to be maintained by them in lieu of a battalion of regular troops withdrawn from thence, and returned to Ireland. Both these messages were referred to the committee of supply, and produced the resolutions upon each subject, which I have already explained.

The message concerning a projected invasion by the enemies of Great Britain I shall specify in its proper place, when I come to record the circumstances and miscarriage of that design. In the mean time, it may not be improper to observe, that the thanks of the house of commons were voted and given to admiral Boscawen and major-general Amherst, for the services they had done their king and country in North America; and the same compliment was paid to admiral Osborne, for the success of his cruize in the Mediterranean.

On the second day of June, the commissioners appointed by his majesty put an end to the session with a speech, addressed to both houses, importing, that the king approved of their conduct, and returned them his thanks for their condescension: that the hopes he had conceived of their surmounting the difficulties which lay in their way, were founded on the wisdom, zeal, and affection, of so good a parliament; and that his expectations were fully answered: that they had considered the war in all its parts; and, notwithstanding its long continuance, through the obstinacy of the enemy, had made such provision for the many different operations, as ought to convince the adversaries of Great Britain, that it would be for their interest, as well as for the ease and relief of all Europe to embrace equitable and honourable terms of accommodation: that, by their assistance, the combined army in Germany had been completed; and powerful squadrons, as well as numerous bodies of land forces, were employed in America, in order to maintain the British rights and possessions, and annoy the enemy in the most sensible manner in that country: that, as France was making considerable preparations in her different ports, his majesty had taken care to put his fleet at home in the best condition, both of strength and situation, to guard against and repel any attempts that might be meditated against his kingdoms: that all his measures had been directed to assert the honour of his crown; to preserve the essential interests of his faithful subjects; to support the cause of the protestant religion, and public liberty; and he therefore trusted, that the uprightness of his intentions would draw down the blessing of heaven upon his endeavours: that he hoped the precautions they had taken to prevent and correct the excesses of the privateers, would produce the desired effect; a consideration which he had much at heart; for, though sensible of the utility of that service, when under proper regulations, he was determined to do his utmost to prevent any injuries or hardships which might be sustained by the subjects of neutral powers, as far as might be practicable, and consistent with his majesty's just right to hinder the trade of his enemies from being collusively and fraudulently covered: that he not only thanked the commons, but likewise applauded the firmness and vigour with which they had acted, as well as their prudence in judging that, notwithstanding the present burdens, the making ample provision for carrying on the war was the most probable means to bring it to an honourable and happy conclusion: that no attention should be wanting, on his part, for the faithful application of what had been granted; and that he had nothing further to desire, but that they would carry down the same good dispositions, and propagate them in their several counties, which they had shewn in their proceedings during the session. This speech being finished, the parliament was prorogued.

The ministry and people of England seemed equally to concur in their sentiments, that the war ought to be prosecuted, as well in Europe as in America, with the utmost spirit and vigour.

For this purpose every preparation was made, and every measure adopted, that the necessity of the service required. The navy was repaired and augmented; and in order to mann the different squadrons, the expedient of pressing, that last resource in cases of necessity, was practised both by land and water with extraordinary rigour and severity. A proclamation was issued, offering a considerable bounty to every seaman and even landman that should, by a certain day, enter voluntarily into the service.

As an additional encouragement to this class of people, the king promised his pardon to all seamen, who had deserted from the respective ships to which they belonged, provided they should return to their duty by the third day of July; but at the same time he declared, that those who should neglect this opportunity at a time when their country so much required their service, would, upon being apprehended, incur the penalty of a court-martial, and if convicted, be deemed unfit objects objects of the royal mercy. All justices of the peace, mayors, and magistrates of corporations throughout Great Britain, were commanded to make particular search for straggling seamen fit for the service, and to send all that should be found to the nearest sea-port, that they might be sent on board by the sea-officer there commanding. Other methods, more gentle and effectual, were taken to levy and recruit the land-forces. New regiments were raised on his majesty's promise, that every man should be intitled to his discharge at the end of three years, and the premiums for enlisting were increased.

Besides these liberal indulgences from the government, considerable bounties were offered and given by cities, towns, corporations, and even by individuals, so universally were the people actuated by a real principle of love to their country. The example was set by the metropolis, where the common-council resolved, that subscriptions should be received in the chamber of London, to be appropriated as bounty-money to such persons as should enter voluntarily into his majesty's service. The city subscribed a considerable sum for this purpose; and a committee of aldermen and commons were appointed to attend at Guildhall, to receive and apply the subscriptions. As a further encouragement to volunteers, they moreover resolved, that every person so entering should be intitled to the freedom of the city, at the expiration of three years, or sooner, if the war should be brought to a conclusion.

These resolutions being signified to the king, he was pleased to express his approbation, and return his thanks to the city, in a letter from the secretary of state to the lord-mayor. Large sums were immediately subscribed by different companies, and some private persons; and in imitation of the capital, bounties were offered by almost every corporation, in every quarter of the united kingdom. At the same time, such care was taken in disciplining the militia, that, before the close of the year, the greater part of those truly constitutional troops equalled the regular forces in the perfection of their exercise, and seemed to be in every respect as fit for actual service.

But it is now time to convert the reader's attention to the Theatre of war on the continent of Europe, where we shall see the English and their allies, acquitting themselves with remarkable spirit, reputation, and success.

The Hanoverian army, commanded by prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, was strengthened by fresh reinforcements from England, augmented with German recruits, regularly paid, and well supplied with every comfort and convenience which foresight could suggest, or money procure; yet, in spite of all the precautions that could be taken, by the severe proceedings of the enemy they were cut off from some resources, which even the extreme necessities of a campaign can hardly excuse. On the second day of January, the French regiment of Nassau presenting itself before the gate of Frankfort on the Mayne, a neutral imperial city, and demanding a passage, it was introduced, and conducted by a detachment of the garrison, thro' the city as far as the gate of Saxen-hausen, where it unexpectedly halted, and immediately disarmed the guards. Before the inhabitants could recover from the consternation into which they were thrown by this outrageous insult, five other French regiments entered the place, and here their general the prince de Soubise established his head-quarters. How deeply soever this violation of the laws of the empire might be resented by all honest Germans, who retained affection for the constitutions of their country; it was a step from which the French army derived a very manifest and important advantage; for it made them masters of the whole course of the Mayne and the Upper Rhine; by which they received, without difficulty or danger, every species of supply from Mentz, Spire, Worms, and even the county of Alsace; while it maintained their communication with the chain formed by the Austrian forces and the army of the empire.

The plan of operations for the ensuing campaign was already concerted between the king of Prussia and prince Ferdinand of Brunswick; and before the armies took the field, several skirmishes were fought, and quarters surprised. In the latter end of February, the prince of Ysembourg detached major-general Urst with four battalions and a body of horse, who advancing to Rhotenburg, fell upon the enemy's quarters in the night between the first and second day of March, and drove them from Hirschfeld, Vacha, and all the Hessian bailiwicks, of which they had taken possession; but the Austrians soon returning in great numbers, and being sustained by a detachment of French troops from Frankfort, the allies were obliged to retreat in their turn. In a few days, however, they themselves were compelled to retire with great precipitation, though they did not all escape. The hereditary prince of Brunswick, with a body of Prussian hussars, fell upon them suddenly at Molrichstadt, where he routed and dispersed a regiment of Hohenzollern cuirassiers, and a battalion of the troops of Wurtzburg. He next day, which was the first of April, proceeded with a body of horse and foot to Meinungen, where he found a considerable magazine, took two battalions prisoners, and surprised a third posted at Wafungen, after having defeated some Austrian troops that were on the march to its relief. While the hereditary prince was thus employed, the duke of Holstein, with another body of the confederates, constrained the French to abandon the post of Freyinstenau.

But the great object was to dislodge the enemy from Frankfort before they should receive the expected reinforcements. Prince Ferdinand of Brühlwic, being determined upon this enterprize, collected all his forces near Fulda, to the amount of forty thousand choice troops, and began his march on the tenth day of April. On the thirteenth he came in sight of the enemy, whom he found strongly intrenched about the village of Bergen, between Frankfort and Hanau. Their general, the duke de Broglie, reckoned one of the best officers in France, in point of conduct and intrepidity, having received information of the prince's design, seized this post on the twelfth, the right of his army being at Bergen, and his center and flanks secured in such a manner, that the allies could not make their attack any way but by the village.

Notwithstanding the advantage of their situation, prince Ferdinand resolved to give them battle, and made his dispositions accordingly. About ten in the morning the grenadiers of the advanced guard began the attack on the village of Bergen with great fury, and sustained a most terrible fire from eight German battalions, reinforced by several brigades of French infantry. The grenadiers of the allied army, though supported by several battalions under the command of the prince of Ysembourg, far from being able to dislodge the enemy from the village, were, after a very obstinate dispute, obliged to retreat in some disorder; but rallied again behind a body of Hessian cavalry.

The allies being repulsed in three different attacks, prince Ferdinand began to think of a retreat, whilst his loss was yet inconsiderable, and the disorder of his men easily to be repaired. But a retreat, in the face of a victorious enemy, was hazardous; and the day was not yet above half spent. In this exigence he made such movements, as strongly indicated a design of falling once more upon the village, in the enemy's right, and of making, at the same time, a new attack upon their left. These appearances were farther countenanced by a cannonade, on both these posts, supported with uncommon fury. The French, deceived by those manœuvres, kept close in their posts: they expected a new and vigorous attack every moment, they returned the cannonade as briskly as they could: and in this posture things continued till night came on, when the prince made an easy retreat without disorder, or molestation, and halted at Windeken.

The loss of the allies in this action amounted to about two thousand men killed and wounded, including the prince of Ysembourg: nor was that of the French much less considerable. The confederates, indeed, suffered nothing in point of reputation; their courage and conduct, through the whole of the engagement, having been equally conspicuous. Prince Ferdinand gained as much honour, and displayed as much skill, as could have been gained or displayed upon a more fortunate occasion. The event, however, was, in its consequences, far from indifferent: for the allies having missed their blow, the French still kept possession of Franckfort, and of all the advantages which they drew from that situation: they had time and means to receive their reinforcements: and they acquired, in a short space, such a superiority, as obliged prince Ferdinand, for a long time after, to content himself with acting on the defensive.

In a few days after the battle, the prince thought proper to continue his retreat towards Fulda, in which his rear suffered considerably from a body of the enemy's light troops, under the command of M. de Blaisel, who surprised two squadrons of dragoons, and a battalion of grenadiers. The first were taken or dispersed; the last escaped with the loss of their baggage. The allied army returned to their cantonments about Munster, and the prince began to make preparations for taking the field in earnest.

While the French enjoyed plenty in the neighbourhood of Dusseldorp and Crevelt, by means of the Rhine, the allies laboured under dearth and scarcity of every species of provision, because the country which they occupied was already exhausted, and all the supplies were brought from an immense distance. The single article of forage occasioned such enormous expence, as alarmed the administration of Great Britain, who, in order to prevent mismanagement and fraud for the future, nominated a member of parliament inspector-general of the forage, and sent him over to Germany in the beginning of the year, with the rank and appointments of a general officer, that the importance of his character, and the nature of his office, might be a check upon those who were suspected of iniquitous appropriations.

Mean while, the French armies on the Upper and Lower Rhine, being put in motion, joined on the third day of June near Marburg, under the command of the mareschal de Contades, who proceeded to the northwards, and established his head-quarters at Corbach; from whence he detached a body of light troops to take possession of Cassel, which, at his approach, was abandoned by general Imhoff. The French army being encamped at Stadtberg, the duke de Broglie, who commanded the right wing, advanced from Cassel into the territories of Hanover, where he seized Göttingen without opposition; while the allied army assembled in the neighbourhood of Lipstadt, and encamped about Soest and Werle. Prince Ferdinand, finding himself inferior to the united forces of the enemy, was obliged to retire as they advanced, after having left strong garrisons in Lipstadt, Retberg, Munster, and Minden.

These precautions, however, did not seem to answer the intended purpose. Retberg was surprised by the duke de Broglie, who likewise took Minden by storm, and made general Zastrow, with his garrison of fifteen hundred men, prisoners of war; a misfortune so much the greater, as it was attended with the loss of an immense magazine of hay and corn, which fell into the hands of the enemy. They likewise made themselves masters of Munster, invested Lipstadt, and all their operations were hitherto successful. The regency of Hanover, alarmed at their progress, determined to provide for the worst, by sending their chancery and most valuable effects to Stade; from whence, in case of necessity, they might be transported by sea to England. At the same time, they employed their utmost endeavours in pressing men for recruiting and reinforcing the army under prince Ferdinand, who still continued to retreat; and on the eleventh day of July transferred his head quarters from Osnabrug to Bomte, near the Weser. Here, having received intelligence that Minden was taken by the French, he sent forward a detachment to secure the post of Stoltz nau on that river, where on the fifteenth he arrived.

Mean while, the French general advancing to Minden, encamped in a strong situation, having that town on his right, a steep hill on his left, a morass in front, and a rivulet in rear. The duke de Broglie commanded a separate body between Hansbergen and Minden, on the other side of the Weser; and a third, under the duke de Brissac, consisting of eight thousand men, occupied a strong post by the village of Coveldt, to facilitate the route of the convoys from Paderborn. Prince Ferdinand, having moved his camp from Stoltz nau to Petershagen, detached the hereditary prince on the twenty-eighth day of July to Lubeke, from whence he dislodged the enemy; and, continuing his route to Rimsel, was joined by major-general Dreves, who had retaken Osnabrug, and cleared all that neighbourhood of the enemy's parties; then he advanced towards Hervorden, and fixed his quarters at Kirchlinneger, to intercept the enemy's convoys from Paderborn. During these transactions, prince Ferdinand marched with the allied army in three columns from Petershagen to Hille, where it encamped, having a morass on the right, the village of Friedewalde on the left, and in front those of Northemmern and Holtzenhausen. Fifteen battalions and nineteen squadrons, with a brigade of heavy artillery, were left under the command of general Wangenheim on the left, behind the village of Dodenhausen, which was fortified with some redoubts, defended by two battalions. Colonel Luckner, with the Hanoverian hussars and a brigade of hunters, sustained by two battalions of grenadiers, was posted between Buckebourg and the Weser, to watch the body of troops commanded by the duke of Broglie on the other side of the river.

On the last day of July the mareschal de Contades, resolving to attack the allied army, ordered the corps of Broglie to repass the river; and advancing in eight columns, about midnight, crossed the rivulet of Barta, that runs along the morass, and falls into the Weser at Minden. At day-break he drew up his army in order of battle, part of it fronting the corps of general Wangenheim at Dodenhausen, and part of it facing Hille; the two wings consisting of infantry, and the cavalry being stationed in the centre. At three in the morning the enemy began to cannonade the prince's quarters at Hille from a battery of six cannon, which they had erected in the preceding evening on the dyke of Eickhorst. This was probably the first intimation he received of their design. He forthwith caused two pieces of artillery to be conveyed to Hille, and ordered the officer of the picquet-guard there posted, to defend himself to the last extremity: at the same time he sent orders to general Giesen, who occupied Lubeke, to attack the enemy's post at Eickhorst; and this service was successfully performed. The prince of Anhalt, lieutenant-general for the day, took possession with the rest of the piquets of the village of Halen, where prince Ferdinand determined to sustain his right. It was already in the hands of the enemy; but they soon abandoned it with precipitation.

The allied army, being put in motion, advanced in eight columns, and occupied the ground between Halen and Hemmern, while General Wangenheim's corps filled up the space between this last village and Dodenhausen. The enemy made their chief attack on the left, intending to force the infantry of Wangenheim's corps, and penetrate between it and the body of the allied army. For this purpose the duke de Broglie charged them with great impetuosity; but was severely checked by a battery of thirty cannon, prepared for his reception by the duke de Buckeburg, grand master of the artillery, and served with admirable effect, under his own eye and direction. About five in the morning, both armies cannonaded each other: at six the fire of the musquetry began with great fury, and the action became very hot towards the right, where six regiments of English infantry, and two battalions of Hanoverian guards, not only bore the whole brunt of the French carabincers and gendarmerie, but absolutely broke every body of horse and foot that advanced to attack them on the left and in the centre. The Hessian cavalry, with some regiments of Holstein, Prussian and Hanoverian horse, commanded by lord George Sackville, whose second was the marquis of Granby, were posted at a considerable distance from the first line of infantry, and divided from it by a wood that bordered on a heath. Orders were sent, during the action, to bring them up; but whether these orders were contradictory or unintelligible, imperfectly understood or carelessly executed, they did not arrive in time to have any share in the action. Nevertheless, the enemy were repulsed in all their attacks with considerable loss: at length they gave way in every part; and about noon, abandoning the field of battle, were pursued to the ramparts of Minden. In this action they lost about seven thousand men, with forty-three large cannon, and many colours and standards; whereas the loss of the allies did not amount to above two thousand men, as it chiefly fell upon a few regiments of British infantry, commanded by the majors-general Waldegrave and Kingsley. To the extraordinary valour of these gallant brigades, and the fire of the British artillery, which was admirably served by the captains Philips, Macbean, Drummond, and Foy, the victory was in a great measure attributed. That same night the enemy crossed the Weser, and burned the bridges over that river. Next day the garrison of Minden surrendered at discretion, and here the victors found a great number of French officers wounded.

This victory, however important, would, in all probability, have been still more decisive, had not the British cavalry neglected to join in this action; but whether this neglect was owing to any confusion in giving or delivering the orders, or to any misapprehension in him who received them, will appear more clearly from the trial of the commander of the English forces, which I shall record amongst the transactions of the ensuing year. Mean while it may not be improper to observe, that prince Ferdinand seemed to be of the last opinion, and this sentiment he even insinuated in the orders which he issued for returning his thanks to such regiments and officers as had distinguished themselves in the action. These orders were as follow:

"His serene highness orders his greatest thanks to be given the whole army, for their bravery and good behaviour yesterday, particularly to the English infantry, and the two battalions of Hanoverian guards; to all the cavalry of the left wing, and to general Wangenheim's corps, particularly the regiment of Holstein, the Hessian cavalry, the Hanoverian regiment du Corps and Hamerstin's; the same to all the brigades of heavy artillery. His serene highness declares publicly, that next to God he attributes the glory of the day to the intrepidity and extraordinary good behaviour of these troops, which he assures them he shall retain the strongest sense of as long as he lives; and if ever, upon any occasion, he shall be able to serve these brave troops, or any of them in particular, it will give him the utmost pleasure. His serene highness orders his particular thanks to be likewise given to general Sporcken, the duke of Holstein, lieutenant generals Imhoff and Urf. His serene highness is extremely obliged to the count de Buckeburg, for his extraordinary care and trouble in the management of the artillery, which was served with great effect; likewise to the commanding officers of the several brigades of artillery, viz. colonel Browne, lieutenant colonel Hutte, major Hasse, and the three English captains, Philips, Drummond, and Foy. His serene highness thinks himself infinitely obliged to major generals Waldegrave and Kingsley, for their great courage, and the good order in which they conducted their brigades. His serene highness further orders it to be declared to lieutenant-general the marquis of Granby, that he is persuaded, that if he had had the good fortune to have had him at the head of the cavalry of the right wing, his presence would have greatly contributed to make the decision of that day more complete and more brilliant. In short, his serene highness orders, that those of his suite whose behaviour he most admired, be named, as the duke of Richmond, colonel Fitzroy, captain Ligonier, colonel Watson, captain Wilson, aid-de-camp to major-general Waldegrave, adjutant generals Erstoff, Bulow, Durendolle, the count Tobe and Malerti; his serene highness having much reason to be satisfied with their conduct. And his serene highness desires and orders the generals of the army, that upon all occasions when orders are brought to them by his aids-de-camp, that they may be obeyed punctually, and without delay." The severe insinuation concerning the disobedience of orders, and the invidious compliment to a subordinate officer, were clear indications of the prince's sentiments.

Mareschal de Contades, in his first movements after the battle of Minden, seemed inclined to retreat through the defiles of Wittekendstein to Paderborn; but he was fain to change his resolution, in consequence of his having received advice, that, on the very day of his own defeat, the duke de Brissac was vanquished by the hereditary prince in the neighbourhood of Coveldt, so that the passage of the mountains was rendered impracticable. The duke de Brissac had been advantageously encamped with his left to the village of Coveldt, having the Werra in his front, and his right extending to the salt-pits. In this advantageous situation he was attacked by the hereditary prince and general de Kilmanseg, with such vivacity and address, that his troops were totally routed, with the loss of six cannon, and a considerable number of men killed, wounded, or taken prisoners. After the battle of Minden, colonel Freytag, at the head of the light troops, took, in the neighbourhood of Detmold, all the equipage of the mareschal de Contades, the prince of Condé, and the duke de Brissac, with part of their military chest and chancery, containing papers of the utmost consequence.

Prince Ferdinand, having supplied Minden with a sufficient garrison, proceeded to Hervorden; and the hereditary prince crossed the Weser at Hamelen, in order to pursue the enemy, who retreated to Cassel, and from thence, by the way of Marburg, as far as Gießen. In a word, they were continually harrassed by that enterprising prince, who seized every opportunity of attacking them in rear; took the greatest part of their baggage; and compelled them to abandon every place they occupied in Westphalia. The number of his prisoners amounted to fifteen hundred men, besides the garrison left at Cassel, which surrendered at discretion.

He likewise surprised a whole battalion, and defeated a considerable detachment under the command of M. d'Armentieres.

In the mean time, the allied army advanced in regular marches; and prince Ferdinand, having secured Cassel, detached general Imhoff, with a body of troops, to reduce the city of Munster, which he accordingly began to batter with great fury; but M. d'Armentieres, being joined by a fresh body of troops from the Lower Rhine, advanced to its relief, and obliged Imhoff to abandon the siege. It was not long, however, before this general was also reinforced; then he measured back his march to Munster, and the French commander retired in his turn. The place was immediately shut up by a close blockade; which, however, did not prevent the introduction of supplies. The city of Munster being an object of importance, was disputed with great obstinacy. Armentieres received reinforcements, and the body commanded by Imhoff was occasionally augmented; but the siege was not formally undertaken till November, when some heavy artillery having arrived from England, the place was regularly invested, and the operations carried on with such vigour, that, in a few days, the city surrendered on capitulation.

Prince Ferdinand having taken possession of the town and castle of Marburg, proceeded with the army to Neidar-Weimar, and there fixed his camp, while Contades remained at Gießen, on the south side the river Lahn, where he was joined by a colleague in the person of the mareschal d'Estrées. By this time he was become extremely unpopular among the troops, on account of the defeat at Minden, which he is said to have attributed to the misconduct of Broglie, who recriminated on him in his turn, and seemed to gain credit at the court of Versailles.

While the two armies lay encamped in the neighbourhood of each other, nothing passed but skirmishes between the light troops, and little excursive expeditions. The French army was employed in carrying off their magazines and fortifying Gießen, as if their intention was to retire to Frankfort on the Mayne; after having destroyed all the forage, and converted the country into a military desert. In the beginning of November, the mareschal duke de Broglie returned from Paris, whither he had lately gone, and assumed the command of their army, from whence Contades and d'Estrées immediately retired, with several other general officers that were senior to the new commander.

The duke of Wirtemberg having occupied the town of Fulda, the hereditary prince of Brunswick resolved to beat up his quarters. For this purpose, on the twenty-eighth day of November, he began his march from Marburg, at the head of a select body of forces. Next night they arrived at Augerbach, from whence they dislodged the volunteers of Nassau; and at one o'clock in the morning, of the thirtieth, they advanced directly to Fulda, where the duke of Wirtemberg, far from expecting such a visit, had invited all the fashionable people in Fulda to a sumptuous entertainment. The hereditary prince, having surveyed the avenues in person, took such measures, that the troops of Wirtemberg, who were scattered in small bodies, would have been cut off, if they had not hastily retired into the town, where, however, they they found no shelter. The prince rushed into the place; and they retreated to the other side of the town, where four battalions of them were routed and taken; while the duke himself, with the rest of his forces, fled off on the other side of the Fulda. Two pieces of cannon, two pair of colours, and all their baggage, fell into the hands of the victors; and the hereditary prince advanced as far as Rupertenrade, a place situated on the right of the French army. Perhaps this motion hastened the resolution of the duke de Broglie to relinquish Gießen, and fall back to Friedberg, where he fixed his head-quarters. The allied army immediately occupied his camp at Kleinlinnes and Heuchelem, and seemed determined to undertake the siege of Gießen.

While both armies remained in this position, the duke de Broglie was honoured with the staff as mareschal of France, and formed a resolution to dislodge the allies. Having recalled all his detachments, he advanced towards them on the twenty-fifth day of December; but found them so well disposed to receive him, that he thought proper to abandon his design, and nothing but a mutual cannonade ensued; after which he returned to his former quarters. From Kleinlinnes the allied army proceeded to Corisdorf, where they were cantoned till the beginning of January, when they fell back as far as Marburg, where prince Ferdinand established his head-quarters. The enemy had by this time, recovered their superiority, in consequence of the hereditary prince's being detached with fifteen thousand men to join the king of Prussia at Freyberg in Saxony. Nevertheless by the victory at Minden, the dominions of Hanover and Brunswick were preserved, and the enemy compelled to evacuate great part of Westphalia. Perhaps they might have been driven to the other side of the Rhine, had not the general of the allies been obliged to weaken his army for the support of the Prussian monarch, who had suffered several losses in the course of this campaign.

It was not to any failure either in point of courage or conduct, that this warlike prince owed the several checks he sustained. Even in the middle of winter, his troops, under general Manteufel, acted with great spirit against the Swedes in Pomerania. They reduced Damgarten, and several other places which the Swedes had garrisoned; and the frost setting in, those who were quartered in the isle of Usedom passed over the ice to Wolgast, which they took without much difficulty. They then laid siege to Demmen and Anclam at the same time, and the garrisons of both surrendered themselves prisoners of war, to the number of two thousand seven hundred men, including officers. In Demmen they found four and twenty pieces of cannon, with a large quantity of ammunition. In Anclam there was a considerable magazine, with six and thirty pieces of cannon, mortars, and howitzers. A large detachment under general Knobloch surprised Erfurth, and raised considerable contributions at Gotha, Eisenach, and Fulda; from whence also they removed all the forage and provisions to Saxe-Naumberg.

In the latter end of February, the Prussian major-general Wobersnow proceeded with a strong body of troops from Glogau in Silesia to Poland; and advancing by the way of Lissa, invested the castle of the prince Sulkowski, a Polish grandee, who had been very active against the interest of the Prussian monarch.

After some resistance, he was obliged to surrender at discretion, and was sent prisoner with his whole garrison to Silesia. From hence Wobersnow wheeled off to Posna, where he made himself master of a considerable magazine, guarded by two thousand Cossacks, who fled at his approach; and, having destroyed several others, returned to Silesia. In April, the fort of Penamunde in Pomerania was surrendered to Manteufel; and about the same time a detachment of Prussian troops bombarded Schwerin, the capital of Mecklenburg. Mean while, reinforcements were sent to the Russian army in Poland, which in April began to assemble on the Vistula. The court of Petersburg had likewise begun to prepare a large fleet, by means of which the army might be supplied with military stores and provisions: but this armament was retarded by an accidental fire at Revel, which destroyed all the magazines and materials for ship-building, to an immense value.

About the latter end of March the king of Prussia assembled his army at Rhonstock, near Strigau; and marching to the neighbourhood of Landshut, took post at Bolchenhayn. On the other hand, the Austrian army, under the command of mareschal Daun, was assembled at Munchengrätz in Bohemia; and the campaign was opened by an exploit of general Beck, who surprised and made prisoners a battalion of Prussian grenadiers, quartered at Greifenberg on the frontiers of Silesia. This advantage, however, was more than counterbalanced by the activity and success of prince Henry, brother to the Prussian king, who commanded the army which wintered in Saxony. About the middle of April he advanced in two columns towards Bohemia, forced the pass of Peterwalde, destroyed the Austrian magazines at Auffig, burned their boats upon the Elbe, seized the forage and provision which the enemy had left at Lowesitz and Leutmeritz, and demolished a new bridge which they had built for their convenience. At the same time, general Hulsén attacked the pass of Passberg, guarded by general Renard, who was taken with two thousand men, including fifty officers: then he proceeded to Satz, in hope of securing the Austrian magazines: but these the enemy consumed, that they might not fall into his hands, and retired towards Prague with the utmost precipitation.

Prince Henry, having happily performed these exploits, and filled all Bohemia with alarm and consternation, returned to Saxony, and distributed his troops in quarters of refreshment in the neighbourhood of Dresden. In a few days, however, they were again put in motion, and advanced to Obelgeburgen; from whence he prosecuted his route through Voigtland, in order to attack the army of the empire in Franconia. He accordingly entered this country, by the way of Hoff, on the seventh of May, and the next day sent a detachment to attack general Macguire, who commanded a body of Imperialists at Asch, and sustained the charge with great gallantry; but finding himself in danger of being overpowered by numbers, he retreated in the night towards Egra. The army of the Empire, commanded by the prince de Deux-ponts, being unable to check the progress of the Prussian general, retired from Cullembach to Bamberg, and from thence to Nuremberg, where, in all probability, they would not have been suffered to remain unmolested, had not prince Henry been recalled to Saxony. He had already taken Cronach and the castle of Rotenberg, and even advanced as far as Bamberg, when he received intelligence, that a body of Austrians, under general Gemmingen, had forced their way into Saxony.

This diversion effectually saved the army of the empire, as prince Henry immediately returned to the electorate, after having laid the bishoprick of Bamberg, and the marquisate of Cullembach, under contribution, destroyed all the magazines provided for the Imperial army, and sent fifteen hundred prisoners to Leipzig. A party of Imperialists, under count Palfy, attempted to harass him in his retreat; but they were defeated near Hoff, with considerable slaughter: nevertheless, the Imperial army, though now reduced to ten thousand men, returned to Bamberg: and as the Prussians approached the frontiers of Saxony, the Austrian general Gemmingen retired into Bohemia. During all these transactions, the mareschal count Daun remained with the grand Austrian army at Schurtz in the circle of Koningsgratz; while the Prussians, commanded by the king in person, continued quietly encamped between Landshut and Schweidnitz. General Fouquet headed a large body of troops in the southern part of Silesia; but these being mostly withdrawn, in order to oppose the Russians, the Austrian general de Ville, who hovered on the frontiers of Moravia, with a considerable detachment, took advantage of this circumstance, and, advancing into Silesia, encamped within sight of Neiss.

In the beginning of June, the king of Prussia, being informed that the Russian army had begun their march from the Vistula, ordered the several bodies of his troops, under Hulsen and Wobernow, reinforced by detachments from his other armies, to join the forces under count Dohna, as general in chief, and march into Poland. Accordingly they advanced to Meritz, where, on the fifteenth day of June, the count published the following declaration:

“His Prussian majesty, finding himself under a necessity to cause part of his armies to enter the territories of the republic of Poland, in order to protect them against the threatened invasion of the enemy, declares, that,

“It must not be understood that his majesty by this step taken, intends to make any breach in the regard he has always had for the illustrious republic of Poland, or to lessen the good understanding which has hitherto subsisted between them, but, on the contrary, to strengthen the same, in expectation that the illustrious republic will, on its part, act with the like neighbourly and friendly good will as is granted to the enemy, than which nothing more is desired.

“The nobility, gentry, and magistracy, in their respective districts, between the frontiers of Prussia, so far as beyond Posen, are required to furnish all kind of provisions, corn, and forage, necessary to support an army of 40,000 men, with the utmost dispatch, with an assurance of being paid ready money for the same. But if, contrary to expectation, any deficiency should happen in supplying this demand, his majesty's troops will be obliged to forage, and use the same means as those taken by the enemy for their subsistence.

“In confidence, therefore, that the several jurisdictions, upon the Prussian frontiers, within the territories of Poland, will exert themselves to comply with this demand as soon as possible, for the subsistence of the royal army of Prussia, they are assured that thereby all disorders will be prevented, and whatever is delivered will be paid for in ready money.”

Two days after he issued another manifesto, to this effect. “It was with the greatest astonishment that the king, my most gracious lord and master, heard that several of his own subjects had suffered themselves to be seduced from their allegiance so far, as to enter into the service of a potentate, with whom he is at war; his majesty, therefore, makes known by these presents, that all of his subjects serving in the enemy's armies, who shall be taken with arms in their hands, shall, agreeably to all laws, be sentenced to be hanged without mercy, as traitors to their king and country. Of which all whom it may concern are desired to take notice, &c.”

On the twenty-second of the same month another declaration was issued to this purpose. “We invite and desire, that the nobility, archbishops, bishops, abbeyes, convents, seignories, magistrates, and inhabitants of the republic of Poland, on the road to Posnania, and beyond it, would repair in person, or by deputies, in the course of this week, or as soon after as possible, to the Prussian head quarters, there to treat with the commander in chief, or the commissary at war, for the delivery of forage and provisions for the subsistence of the army, to be paid for with ready money.

“We promise and assure ourselves, that no person in Poland will attempt to seduce the Prussian troops to desert; that no assistance will be given them in such perfidious practices; that they will neither be sheltered, concealed, or lodged; which would be followed by very disagreeable consequences: we expect, on the contrary, that persons of all ranks and conditions will stop any run away or deserter, and deliver him up at the first advanced post, or at the head-quarters; and all expences attending the same shall be paid, and a reasonable gratification superadded.

“If any one hath any inclination to enter into the king of Prussia's service, with an intention to behave well and faithfully, he may apply to the head-quarters, and be assured of a capitulation for three or four years.

“If any prince or member of the republic of Poland be disposed to assemble a body of men, and to join in a troop, or in a company, the Prussian army, to make a common cause with it, he may depend on a gracious reception, and that due regard will be shewn to his merit, &c.”

From Meritz the Prussians marched towards Posna, where they found the Russian army under count Soltikoff strongly encamped, having in their rear that city and the river Warta, and in their front a formidable intrenchment mounted with a great number of cannon. Count Dohna finding it impossible to attack them in this situation with any prospect of success, endeavoured to cut off their supplies from the eastward; but for want of provision, was, in a little time, obliged to return towards the Oder: then the Russians advanced to Zullichau in Silesia. The king of Prussia thinking count Dohna had been rather too cautious, considering the emergency of affairs, gave him leave to retire for the benefit of his health, and conferred his command upon general Wedel, who resolved immediately to give the Russians battle. Thus determined, he marched against them in two columns; and, on the twenty-third day of July, attacked them at Kay, near Zullichau, where, after a very obstinate engagement, he was repulsed with great loss, Wobernow being killed, and Manteufel wounded in the action; and in a few days, the Russians took possession of Franckfort upon the Oder.

By this time, the armies of count Daun and the king of Prussia had made several motions. The Austrians having quitted their camp at Schurtz, advanced towards Zittau in Lusatia, where having halted a few days, they resumed their march, and encamped at Gorlitzhayn, between Sudenberg and Mark-Lissa. His Prussian majesty, in order the more narrowly to watch their motions, marched by the way of Herchberg to Lahn; and his vanguard skirmished with that of the Austrians commanded by Laudohn, who entered Silesia by the way of Griefenberg. The Austrian general was obliged to retire with loss; while the king penetrated into Silesia, that he might be at hand to act against the Russians, whose progress was now become truly alarming. He no sooner received intimation that Wedel had been worsted, than he marched with a select body of ten thousand men from his camp in Silesia, in order to take upon him the command of Wedel's army, leaving the rest of his forces strongly encamped, under the direction of his brother prince Henry, who had joined him before this event. Count Daun being informed of the king's intention, and knowing the Russians were very defective in cavalry, immediately detached a body of twelve thousand horse, to join them, under the command of Laudohn; and these, penetrating in two columns through Silesia and Lusatia, with some loss, arrived in the Russian camp at a very critical juncture.

Mean while the king of Prussia joined general Wedel on the fourth day of August at Muhlrose, where he assumed the command of the army: but finding it greatly inferior to the enemy, he recalled general Finck, whom he had detached some time before, with a body of nine thousand men, to oppose the progress of the Imperialists in Saxony: for when prince Henry joined his brother in Silesia, the army of the Empire had entered that electorate. Thus reinforced, the number of the king's army at Muhlrose did not amount to above fifty thousand, whereas the Russians were more numerous by about forty thousand. They had chosen a strong camp at the village of Cunersdorf, almost opposite to Franckfort upon the Oder, and increased the natural strength of their situation by intrenchments mounted with a formidable artillery. In other circumstances, it might have been deemed a foolish and ridiculous enterprize, to attack such an army under such complicated disadvantages: but here was no room for hesitation. The king's affairs seemed to require a desperate effort; and perhaps, in his situation, rashness could hardly dictate any thing which would not have been recommended by prudence.

Having determined to hazard an attack, he made his dispositions, and on the twelfth day of August, at two in the morning, his troops were in motion. The army being drawn up in a wood, advanced towards the enemy; and about eleven, the action was begun with a severe cannonade. This having produced the desired effect, he charged the left wing of the Russian army with his best troops formed in columns. After a very obstinate dispute, the enemy's entrenchments were forced with great slaughter, and seventy pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the Prussians. A narrow defile was afterwards passed, and several redoubts that covered the village of Cunersdorf were taken by assault, one after another. One half of the task was not yet performed: The Russians made a firm stand at the village: but they were overborne by the impetuosity of the Prussians, who drove them from post to post up to the last redoubts they had to defend. As the Russians kept their ground until they were hewn down in their ranks, this success was not acquired without infinite labour, and a considerable expence of blood. After a furious contest of six hours, fortune seemed to declare so much in favour of the Prussians, that the king dispatched the following billet to the queen at Berlin: "Madam, we have driven the Russians from their intrenchments. In two hours expect to hear of a glorious victory."

This news arrived at Berlin just as the post was setting out, and the friends of the king of Prussia throughout Europe exulted in the prospect of a sure and decisive victory. Mean while fortune was preparing for him a terrible reverse. The Russians were staggered, not routed. General Solतिकoff rallied his troops, and reinforced his left wing under cover of a redoubt, which was erected on an eminence called the Jews Burying-ground, and here they stood in order of battle, with the most resolute countenance; favoured by the situation, which was naturally difficult of access, and now rendered almost impregnable by the fortification, and a numerous artillery, still greatly superior to that of the Prussians. Had the king contented himself with the advantage already gained, all the world would have acknowledged he had fought against terrible odds with astonishing prowess; and that he judiciously desisted, when he could no longer persevere without incurring the imputation of folly and imprudence. His troops had not only suffered severely from the enemy's fire, which was close, deliberate, and well directed, but they were fatigued by the hard service, and fainting with the heat of the day, which was excessive. His general officers are said to have reminded him of all these circumstances; and to have dissuaded him from hazarding an attempt attended with such danger and difficulty, as even an army of fresh troops could hardly hope to surmount. He rejected this salutary advice, and ordered his infantry to begin a new attack, which being an enterprize beyond their strength, they were repulsed with great slaughter. Being afterwards rallied, they returned to the charge: they miscarried again, and their loss was redoubled. Being thus rendered unfit for further service, the cavalry succeeded to the attack, and repeated their unsuccessful efforts, until they were almost broke and entirely exhausted.

At

At this critical juncture, the whole body of the Austrian and Russian cavalry, which had hitherto remained inactive, and were therefore fresh and in spirits, fell in among the Prussian horse with great fury, broke their line at the first charge, and forcing them back upon the infantry, threw them into irreparable disorder. The Prussian army being thus involved in confusion, was seized with a panic, and in a few minutes totally defeated and dispersed, notwithstanding the personal efforts of the king, who hazarded his life in the hottest parts of the battle, led on his troops three times to the charge, while two horses were killed under him, and his cloaths, in several parts, penetrated with musquet balls. His army being routed, and the greater part of his generals either killed or disabled by wounds, nothing but the approach of night could have saved him from total ruin. When he abandoned the field of battle, he dispatched another billet to the queen, couched in these terms: "Remove from Berlin with the royal family. Let the archives be carried to Potsdam. The town may make conditions with the enemy." The horror and confusion which this intimation produced at Berlin may be easily conceived: horror the more aggravated, as it seized them in the midst of their rejoicing occasioned by the first dispatch; and this was still more dreadfully augmented, by a subsequent indistinct relation, importing, that the army was totally routed, the king missing, and the enemy in full march to Berlin. The battle of Cunerstorf was by far the most bloody action that had happened since the commencement of hostilities. The loss of the Prussians in killed, wounded, and prisoners, amounted to almost twenty thousand men. General Putkammer was among the slain. The generals Seydelitz, Itzenplitz, Hullen, Fink, and Wedel, the prince of Wurtemberg, and five major generals, were wounded. The loss of the enemy, though not so considerable as that of the Prussians, could not fall much short of ten thousand.

The day after the battle, the king of Prussia repassed the Oder, and encamped at Retwein. From thence he moved to Fustenwalde, and placed himself in such a manner, that the Russians did not venture to make any attempt upon Berlin. He continually watched their army; part of which, instead of turning towards Brandenburg, marched into Lusatia, where it joined that of the Austrians. Here the victorious general Soltikoff, for the first time, met M. Daun, and amidst rejoicings and congratulations, consulted about the means of improving their success. The Russian and Austrian armies, thus united, scarce seemed, from their present strength and their past victories, to have any other deliberation left, than of what part of the Prussian dominions they should take immediate possession. The king had been twice defeated with a vast loss. He was cut off from all communication with the army of his brother, prince Henry; yet, to the astonishment of the world, the superior, the victorious, and the united armies acted upon the defensive, and were curbed in all their designs, by the inferior, the beaten, and divided. Never shone the genius of his Prussian majesty with greater lustre than in his conduct after the battle of Cunerstorf. In a few days after so terrible a defeat, every thing was in order in his camp. He reassembled and refreshed his broken troops; he furnished himself with cannon from the arsenal at Berlin, which likewise supplied him with a considerable number of recruits; he recalled general Kleist, with five thousand men, from Pomerania; and, in a little time, retrieved his former importance.

The army of the empire having entered Saxony, where it reduced Leipzig, Torgau, and even took possession of Dresden itself, the king detached six thousand men under general Wunch, to oppose the progress of the Imperialists in that electorate; and observing the Russians intended to besiege Great Glogau, he, with the rest of his army, took post between them and that city, so as to disappoint their design. While the four great armies, commanded by the king of Prussia, general Soltikoff, prince Henry, and count Daun, lay encamped in Lusatia, and on the borders of Silesia, watching the motions of each other, the war was carried on by detachments with great vivacity. General Wunch having retaken Leipzig, and joined Finck at Eulenburg, the united body began their march towards Dresden; and a detachment from the army of the empire, which had encamped near Dobelin, retired at their approach. As they advanced to Nossin, general Haddick relinquished the advantageous post he occupied near Roth Scemberg, and being joined by the whole army of the empire, resolved to attack the Prussian generals, who now encamped at Corbitz near Meissen; accordingly, on the twenty-first day of September, he marched towards them, and endeavoured to dislodge them by a furious cannonade, which was mutually maintained from morning to night, when he found himself obliged to retire with considerable loss; leaving the field of battle, with about five hundred prisoners, in the hands of the Prussians.

This advantage was succeeded by another exploit of prince Henry; who, on the twenty-third day of the month, quitted his camp at Hornsdorf, near Gorlitz, and, after an incredible march of eleven German miles, by the way of Rothenburg, arrived, about five in the afternoon, at Hoyerwerda, where he surprised a body of four thousand men, commanded by general Veyla, killed six hundred, and made twice that number prisoners; including the commander himself. After this achievement, he joined the corps of Finck and Wunch; while marechal Daun likewise abandoned his camp in Lusatia, and made a forced march to Dresden, in order to defeat the prince's supposed design on that capital. The Russians, disappointed in their scheme upon Glogau, had repassed the Oder at Neusalze, and were encamped at Fraustadt; general Laudohn, with a body of Austrians, lay at Schlichtingskeim; and the king of Prussia at Koben: all three on, or near the banks of that river.

Prince Henry observing his army almost environed by Austrian detachments, ordered general Finck to drive them from Vogelsang, which they abandoned accordingly; and sent Wunch with six battalions and some cavalry across the Elbe, to join the corps of general Rebentish at Wittenberg, whither he had retired from Duben, at the approach of the Austrians. On the twenty-ninth day of October the duke d'Aremberg, with sixteen thousand Austrians, decamped from Dammitz, in order to seize the heights near Pretsch, and was attacked attacked by general Wunch, who, being posted on two eminences, cannonaded the Austrians in their march with considerable effect; and the prince took twelve hundred prisoners, including lieutenant-general Gemmingen, and twenty inferior officers, with some cannon, great part of their tents, and a large quantity of baggage. The duke was constrained to change his route, while Wunch marched from Duben to Eulenburg: and general Waffersleben entered Strehla, where next day the whole army encamped. In this situation the prince continued, till the sixteenth day of November; when, being in danger of having his communication with Torgau cut off by the enemy, he removed to a strong camp, where his left flank was covered by that city and the river Elbe; his right being secured by a wood, and great part of his front by an impassable morass.

Here he was reinforced with above twenty thousand men from Silesia, and joined by the king himself; who forthwith detached general Finck with nineteen battalions, and thirty-five squadrons, to take possession of the defiles of Maxen and Ortendorf, with a view to prevent the retreat of the Austrians to Bohemia. This motion obliged Daun to retire to Plauen; and the king advanced to Wilddurff, imagining that he had effectually succeeded in his design. Letters were sent to Berlin and Magdeburg, intimating that Count Daun would be forced to hazard a battle, as he had now no resource but in victory. Finck had no sooner taken post on the hill near the village of Maxen, than the Austrian general sent officers to examine his situation, and immediately determined to attack him with the corps de reserve under the Baron de Sincere, which was encamped in the neighbourhood of Dippoldswalda. It was forthwith divided into four columns, which filed off through the neighbouring woods; and the Prussians never dreamed of their approach, until they saw themselves intirely surrounded.

In this emergency they defended themselves with their cannon and musquetry, until they were overpowered by numbers, and their battery was taken: then they retired to another rising-ground, where they rallied; but were driven from eminence to eminence, until, by favour of the night, they made their last retreat to Falkenhayn. In the mean time count Daun had made such dispositions, that at day break general Finck had found himself intirely inclosed, without the least possibility of escaping, and sent a trumpet to count Daun to demand a capitulation. This was granted in one single article, importing, that he and eight other Prussian generals, with the whole body of troops they commanded, should be received as prisoners of war. He was obliged to submit; and his whole corps, amounting to nineteen battalions and thirty-five squadrons, with sixty-four pieces of cannon, fifty pair of colours, and twenty-five standards, fell into the hands of the Austrian general.

This misfortune was the more mortifying to the king of Prussia, as it implied a censure on his conduct, for having detached such a numerous body of troops to a situation where they could not be supported by the rest of his army. On the other hand, the court of Vienna exulted in this victory as an infallible proof of Daun's superior talents; and, in point of glory and advantage, much more than an equivalent for the loss of the Saxon army, which had surrendered in much the same manner, and very near the same place, in the year 1756.

The king of Prussia had not time to recover from this stroke, under which he was yet staggering, when he received another, and a severe blow. General Diercke, who was posted with seven battalions of infantry, and a thousand horse, on the right bank of the Elbe, opposite to Meissen, finding it impracticable to lay a bridge of pontoons across the river, on account of the floating ice, was obliged to transport his troops in boats; and when all were passed, except himself, with the rear guard, consisting of three battalions, he was on the third day of December, in the morning, attacked by a strong body of Austrians, and taken, with all his men, after an obstinate dispute. The king of Prussia, weakened by these two successive defeats, that happened in the rear of an unfortunate campaign, would hardly have been able to maintain his ground at Freyberg, had he not been at this juncture reinforced by the body of troops under the command of the hereditary prince of Brunswic. As for Daun, the advantages he had gained did not elevate his mind above the usual maxims of his cautious discretion. Instead of attacking the king of Prussia, respectable and formidable even in adversity, he quietly occupied the strong camp at Pirna, where he might be at hand to succour Dresden, in case it should be attacked, and preserve his communication with Bohemia.

By this time the Russians had retired to winter quarters in Poland; and the Swedes, after a fruitless excursion in the absence of Manteufel, retreated to Stralsund in the isle of Rugen. This campaign, therefore, did not prove more decisive than the last. Abundance of lives were lost; and a great part of Germany was exposed to rapine, murder, famine, desolation, and every species of misery that accompanies war. In vain did the confederated powers of Austria, Russia, and Sweden, exert their united efforts to crush the Prussian monarch. Though his army had been defeated, and he himself totally overthrown, with great slaughter, in the heart of his own dominions; though he appeared in a desperate situation, encompassed by hostile armies, and two considerable detached bodies of his troops were taken or destroyed; yet he kept all his adversaries at bay till the approach of winter, which proved his best auxiliary; and even maintained his footing in the electorate of Saxony, which seemed to be the prize contested between him and the Austrian general. Yet, long before the approach of winter, one would have imagined that he must have been crushed between the flock of so many adverse hosts, had they been intent upon closing him in, and heartily concurred for his destruction: but, instead of urging the war with accumulated force, they acted in separate bodies, and with jealous eye seemed to regard the progress of each other. It was not therefore to any compunction, or kind of forbearance in the court of Vienna, that the inactivity of Daun was owing. The resentment of the house of Austria seemed, on the contrary, to glow with redoubled fury, and the majority of the Germanic body appeared to engage heartily in her quarrel.

When the Protestant states in arms against the court of Vienna were subjected to the ban of the empire, the evangelical body, though without the concurrence of the Swedish and Danish ministers issued an arret at Ratisbon in the month of November in the last year, and to this annexed the twentieth article of the capitulation signed by the emperor at his election, in order to demonstrate that the Protestant states claimed nothing but what was agreeable to the constitution. They declared that their association was no more than a mutual engagement, by which they obliged themselves to adhere to the laws, without suffering under any pretext, that the power of putting under the ban of the empire, should reside wholly in the emperor. They affirmed, that this power was renounced, in express terms, by the capitulation: they therefore refused to admit, as legal, any sentence of the ban, deficient in the requisite conditions; and inferred, that, according to law, neither the elector of Brandenburg, nor the elector of Hanover, nor the duke of Wolfenbuttle, nor the landgrave of Hesse, nor the count of Lippe Buckeburg, ought to be proscribed.

The Imperial Protestant cities having acceded to this arret or declaration, the emperor, in a rescript, required them to retract their accession to the resolution of the evangelic body: and this rescript having produced no effect, the arret was answered in February by an Imperial decree of commission, carried to the dictature, importing, that the imperial court could not longer hesitate about the execution of the ban, without infringing that very article of the capitulation which they had specified: that the invalidity of the arret was manifest, inasmuch as the electors of Brandenburg and Brunswick, the dukes of Saxe Gotha and Brunswick Wolfenbuttle, and the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, were the very persons who disturbed the empire: this, therefore, being an affair in which they themselves were parties, they could not possibly be qualified to concur in a resolution of this nature: besides, the number of the other states which had acceded was very considerable: for these reasons, the emperor could not but consider the resolution in question as an act whereby the general peace of the empire was disturbed, both by the parties that had incurred the ban, and by the states which had joined them, in order to support and favour their frivolous pretensions. His Imperial majesty expressed his hope and confidence, that the other electors, princes, and states of the empire, would vote the said resolution to be null, and of no force; and never suffer so small a number of states, who were adherents of and abettors to the disturbers of the empire, to prejudice the rights and prerogatives of the whole Germanic body; to abuse the name of the associated estates of the Augsbourg confession, in order forcibly to impose a factum, intirely repugnant to the constitution of the empire; to deprive their co-estates of the right of voting freely, and thereby endeavouring totally to subvert the system of the Germanic body.

The implacability of the court of Vienna was exceeded only by the perseverance of the French ministry. Though their numerous army had not gained one inch of ground in Westphalia, the campaign on that side having ended exactly where it had begun; though their chief settlements in the West Indies had fallen into the hands of Great Britain, and they had already laid their account with the loss of Quebec; though their coffers were entirely drained, and their confederates clamoured for the payment of their subsidies; they still determined to maintain the war in Germany: and this, it must be owned, was the most politic resolution which they could possibly adopt; as there their whole force could be easily employed to much more advantage than any other part of the world, and that too without any great augmentation of the ordinary expence. Some of the springs of their national wealth were indeed exhausted, or diverted into other channels: but the subjects declared for a continuation of the war, and the necessities of the state were supplied by the loyalty and attachment of the people. They not only acquiesced in the bankruptcy of public credit, when the court stopt payment of the interest on twelve different branches of the national debt; but they likewise sent in large quantities of plate to be melted down, and coined into specie, for the maintenance of the war. All the bills drawn on the government by the colonies were protested, to an immense amount; and a stop was put to all the annuities granted at Marseilles, on sums borrowed for the use of the marine. Besides the considerable savings arising by these acts of state-bankruptcy, they had resources of credit among the merchants of Holland, who beheld the success of Great Britain with a jealous eye; and were moreover inflamed against her, with the most rancorous resentment, on account of the captures which had been made of their West India ships by the English cruisers.

In the month of February, the merchants of Amsterdam having received advice that the cargoes of their West India ships, detained by the English, would, by the British courts of judicature, be declared lawful prizes, as being French property, sent a deputation with a petition to the States-general, intreating them to use their intercession with the court of London, representing the impossibility of furnishing the proofs required, in so short a time as that prescribed by the British admiralty; and that, as the island of St. Eustatia had but one road, and there was no other way of taking in cargoes, but that of overshippen*, to which the English had objected, a condemnation of these ships, as legal prizes, would give the finishing stroke to the trade of the colony. Whatever remonstrances the States-general might have made on this subject, to the ministry of Great Britain, they had no influence upon the proceedings of the court of admiralty, which continued to condemn the cargoes of the Dutch ships, as often as they were proved to be French property; and this resolute uniformity, in a little time, intimidated the subjects of Holland from persevering in this illicit branch of commerce. The enemies of England in that republic, however, had so far prevailed, that, in the beginning of the year, the states of Holland had passed a formal resolution to equip five and twenty ships of war; and orders were immediately dispatched to the officers of the admiralty, to complete the armament with all possible expedition.

In the month of April, the States-general sent over to London three ministers extraordinary, to make representations, and remove, if possible, the causes of misunderstanding that had arisen between Great Britain and the United Provinces. They delivered their credentials to the king, with a formal harangue, importing, that his majesty would see, by the contents of the letter they had the honour to present, how ardently their High Mightinesses desired to cultivate the sincere friendship which had so long subsisted between the two nations, so necessary for their common welfare and preservation: that they earnestly wished they might be happy enough to remove those difficulties which had for some time struck at this friendship, and caused so much prejudice to the principal subjects of the republic; who, by the commerce they carried on, constituted its greatest strength, and chief support; that their whole confidence was placed in his majesty's equity, for which the republic had the highest regard; and in the good will he had always expressed toward a state, which, on all occasions, had interested itself in promoting his glory; a state which was the guardian of the precious trust bequeathed by a princess so dear to his affection: that they humbly presumed to flatter themselves, that his majesty would be graciously pleased to listen to their just demands: and that they, for their part, should endeavour, during the course of their ministry, to merit his approbation, in strengthening the bonds by which the two nations ought to be for ever united.

In answer to this oration, the king assured them, that he had always regarded their High Mightinesses as his best friends: that, if difficulties had arisen concerning trade, they ought to be considered as the consequences of a burthensome war, which he was obliged to wage with France: and he desired they would assure their High Mightinesses, that he should studiously endeavour to remove the obstacles in question; and expressed his satisfaction, that they (the deputies) were come over with the same disposition.

What effect these representations had upon the ministry of Great Britain does not appear: but, in all probability, the subjects of Holland were by no means pleased with the success of their negotiation; for they murmured against the English nation without ceasing. They threatened and complained by turns, and eagerly laid hold of every opportunity to display their partiality in favour of the enemies of Great Britain.

In the month of September, major general York, the British minister at the Hague, delivered a memorial to the States-general representing, that the merchants of Holland carried on a contraband trade in favour of France, by transporting cannon and warlike stores, from the Baltic to Holland, in Dutch bottoms, under the borrowed names of private persons; and then conveyed them by the inland rivers and canals, or through the Dutch fortresses to Dunkirk and other places of France; that he hoped the king his master would be made easy on that head, by their putting an immediate stop to such practices, so repugnant to the connections subsisting by treaty, between Great Britain and the United Provinces, as well as to every idea of neutrality: that the attention, which his majesty had lately given to their representations, against the excesses of the English privateers, by procuring an act of parliament, which laid them under proper restrictions, gave him a good title to the same regard on the part of their High Mightinesses: that their trading towns felt the good effects of these restrictions; and that the freedom of navigation, which their subjects enjoyed amidst the troubles and distractions of Europe, had considerably augmented their commerce: that some return ought to be made to such solid proofs of the king's friendship and moderation; at least, the merchants, who were so ready to complain of England, ought not to be countenanced in excesses which would have justified the most rigorous examination of their conduct: that, during the course of the present war, the king had several times applied to their High Mightinesses, and to their ministers, on the liberty they had given to carry stores through the fortresses of the republic for the use of France, to invade the British dominions; and though his majesty had passed over in silence many of these instances of complaisance to his enemy, he was no less sensible of the injury; but he chose rather to be a sufferer himself, than to encrease the embarrassment of his neighbours, or extend the flames of war: that even the court of Vienna had, upon more than one occasion, employed its interest with their High Mightinesses, and lent its name to obtain passes for warlike stores and provisions for the French troops, under colour of the Barrier-Treaty, which it no longer observed; nay, after having put France in possession of Ostend and Nieuport, in manifest violation of that treaty, and without any regard to the right which they and the king his master had acquired in that treaty, at the expence of so much blood and treasure.

This memorial seems to have made some impression on the States-general, as they scrupled to allow the artillery and stores belonging to the French king to be removed from Amsterdam: but these scruples vanished entirely on the receipt of a counter-memorial presented by the count d'Asiry, the French ambassador, who mingled some effectual threats with his expostulation. He said, that during the whole course of the war, the French king had required nothing from their friendship that was inconsistent with the strictest impartiality; and if he had deviated from the engagements subsisting between him and the republic, it was only by granting the most essential and lucrative favours to the subjects of their High Mightinesses: that the English, notwithstanding the insolence of their behaviour to the republic, had derived, on many occasions, assistance from the protection their effects had found in the territories of the United Provinces: that the artillery, stores, and ammunition belonging to Wessel were deposited in their territories, which the Hanoverian army in passing the Rhine had very little respected: that when they repassed that river, they had no other way of saving their sick and wounded from the hands of the French, than by embarking them in boats, and conveying them to places where the French left them unmolested, actuated by their respect for the neutrality of the republic: that part of their magazines was still deposited in the towns of the United Provinces; where also the enemies of France had purchased and contracted for very considerable quantities of gun-powder: that tho' these and several other circumstances might have been made the subject of the justest complaints, the king of France did not think it proper to require, that the freedom and independency of the subjects of the republic should be restrained in branches of commerce that were not inconsistent with its neutrality, persuaded that the faith of an engagement ought to be inviolably preserved, though attended with some accidental and transient disadvantages: that the king, his master, had ordered the generals of his army carefully to avoid encroaching on the territory of the public, and transferring thither the theatre of the war, when his enemies retreated that way before they were forced to repass the Rhine: that after such unquestionable marks of regard, the king would have the justest ground of complaint, if, contrary to expectation, he should hear that the artillery and stores belonging to him were detained at Amsterdam: that such detention would be construed as a violation of the neutrality; and he, therefore, demanded, in the name of the king his master, that the artillery and stores should be, without delay, forwarded to Flanders by the canals of Amsterdam and the inland navigation. This last argument was so conclusive, that they immediately granted the necessary passports, in consequence of which the cannon were conveyed to the Austrian Netherlands.

The powers in the southern parts of Europe were so much engrossed with their own concerns, that they had neither leisure nor inclination to interest themselves in the quarrels of the more northern princes. The king of Spain, naturally of a melancholy complexion, and delicate constitution, was so deeply affected for the loss of his queen, who died in the course of the preceding year, that he renounced all company, neglected all business, and immured himself in a chamber at Villa Viciosa, where he gave a loose to the most extravagant sorrow. He abstained from food and rest until his strength was quite exhausted. He would neither shift himself, nor allow his beard to be shaved: he rejected all attempts of consolation, and remained deaf to the most earnest and respectful remonstrances of those who had a right to tender their advice.

In this case, the affliction of the mind must have been augmented by some peculiarity in the constitution. He inherited a melancholy taint from his father, and this seems to have been dreaded as a family disease; for the infant Don Lewis, who likewise resided at the palace of Villa Viciosa, was obliged to amuse himself with hunting, and other diversions, to prevent his being infected with the king's disorder, which continued to gain ground, notwithstanding all the efforts of medicine. The Spanish nation, naturally superstitious, had recourse to saints and relicts; but these seemed to pay no regard to their prayers. The king, however, in the midst of all his distress, was persuaded to make his will, which was written by the count de Valparaiso, and signed by the duke of Bejar, high chancellor of the kingdom. The violence of his grief, and the mortifications he underwent, soon produced an incurable malady, under which he languished from the month of September in the preceding year, till the tenth of August in the present, when he expired. In his will he had appointed his brother Don Carlos, king of Naples, successor to the crown of Spain; and nominated the queen-dowager as regent of the kingdom, until that prince should arrive. Accordingly she assumed the reins of government, and gave directions for the funeral of the deceased king, who was interred with great pomp in the church belonging to the convent of the visitation at Madrid.

As the death of this prince had been long expected, the politicians of Europe had universally prognosticated that his demise would be attended with great commotions in Italy. It had been agreed among the subscribing powers to the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, that in case Don Carlos should be advanced in the course of succession to the throne of Spain, his brother Don Philip should succeed him on the throne of Naples; and the duchies of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla, which now constituted his establishment, should revert to the house of Austria. The king of Naples had never acceded to this article, therefore he paid no regard to it on the death of his elder brother; but retained both kingdoms without minding the claims of the empress-queen, who, he knew, was at that time in no condition to make good her pretensions. Thus the German war proved a circumstance very favourable to his interest and ambition.

Before he set out for Spain, however, he took some extraordinary steps, which evinced him a sound politician and sagacious legislator. His eldest son Don Philip, who had now attained the thirteenth year of his age, being found in a state of incurable idiotism*, he wisely and resolutely removed

* Abstract of the report made to his Catholic majesty by the physicians appointed to examine the prince royal, his eldest son, in consequence of which his royal highness has been declared incapable of succeeding to the throne of Spain. Translated from the original, published at Naples, September 27.

1. Though his royal highness Don Philip is 13 years old, he is low of stature; and yet the king his father, and the queen his mother, are both of a very proper height.

2. His royal highness has some contraction in his joints, though he can readily move, and make use of them on all occasions.

3. His royal highness is apt to stoop and to hold down his head, as people of weak eyes often do.

4. The prince most evidently squints, and his eyes frequently water, and are gummy, particularly his left eye; though we cannot say he is blind, but are rather certain of the contrary, as his royal highness can without doubt distinguish objects, both as to their colour and situation.

5. In his natural functions, and the most common sensations, he is sometimes indifferent to things that are convenient for him, and at other times is too warm and impetuous. In general, his passions are not restrained by reason.

6. The prince has an obstinate aversion to some kind of common food, such as fruits, sweet-meats, &c.

7. All sorts of noise or sound disturbs or disconcerts him; and it has the same effect whether it be soft and harmonious, or harsh and disagreeable.

8. The impression that he receives from pain or pleasure, are neither strong nor lasting, and he is utterly unacquainted with all the punctilios of politeness and good breeding.

9. As to facts and places, he sometimes remembers them, and sometimes not; but he seems not to have the least ideas of the mysteries of our holy religion.

10. He delights in childish amusements; and those which are most boisterous please him best. He is continually changing them, and shifting from one thing to another.

Signed by Don Francis Beniore, chief physician to the king and kingdom: Don Emanuel de la Rosa, physician to the queen; and the physician Caesar Ciribue, Don Thomas Pinto, Don Francis Sarrao, and Don Dominique San Severino.

him from the succession, without any regard to the pretended right of primogeniture, by a solemn act of abdication, and settlement of the crown of the Two Sicilies in favour of his third son, Don Ferdinand. In this extraordinary act he observes, that, according to the spirit of the treaties of this age, Europe required that the sovereignty of Spain should be separated from that of Italy, when such a separation could be effected without transgressing the rules of justice: that the unfortunate prince-royal having been destitute of reason and reflection ever since his infancy, and no hope remaining that he could ever acquire the use of these faculties, he could not think of appointing him to the succession, how agreeable soever such a disposition might be to nature and his paternal affection: he was therefore constrained, by the Divine Will, to set him aside, in favour of his third son Ferdinand, whose minority obliged him to vest the management of these realms in a regency, which he accordingly appointed, after having previously declared his son Ferdinand from that time emancipated, and freed not only from obedience to his paternal power, but even from all submission to his supreme and sovereign authority. He then ordained, that the minority of the princes succeeding to the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, should expire with the fifteenth year of their age, when they should act as sovereigns, and have the entire power of the administration. He next established and explained the order of succession in the male and female line; on condition that the monarchy of Spain should never be united with the kingdoms of the Two Sicilies. Finally, he transferred and made over to the said Don Ferdinand these kingdoms, with all that he possessed in Italy; and this ordinance, signed and sealed by himself and the infant Don Ferdinand, and countersigned by the counsellors and secretary of state, in quality of members of the regency, received all the forms of authenticity that could render it valid.

Don Carlos having taken these precautions for his third son, whom he left king of Naples, embarked with the rest of his family on board a squadron of Spanish ships, which conveyed him to Barcelona. There he landed in the month of October, and proceeded to Madrid, where, as king of Spain, he was received amidst the acclamations of his people. He began his reign like a wise prince, by regulating the interior œconomy of his kingdom; by retaining the ministry under whose auspice the happiness and commerce of his people had been extended; and with respect to the belligerent powers, by scrupulously adhering to that neutrality from whence these advantages were in a great measure derived.

The attention of his Portuguese majesty was engrossed by a species of employment of a far less pleasing and agreeable nature; namely, by the trial and punishment of those conspirators, who had made such a desperate attempt to deprive him of his life. Among these were numbered some of the first noblemen of the kingdom, irritated by disappointed ambition, inflamed by bigotry, and exasperated by revenge. The principal conspirator, Don Joseph Mascarenhas and Lencastre, duke of Aveiro, marquis of Torres Novas, and conde of Santa Cruz, was hereditary lord-steward of the king's household, and president of the palace court, or last tribunal of appeal in the kingdom:

so that he possessed the first office in the palace, and the second of the realm. Francisco de Aliz, marquis of Tavora, conde of St. John and Alvor, was general of the horse, and head of the third noble house of the Tavoras, the most illustrious family in the kingdom, deriving their origin from the ancient kings of Leon: he married his own kinswoman, who was marchioness of Tavora in her own right, and by this marriage acquired the marquisate. Louis Bernardo de Tavora was their eldest son, who, by virtue of a dispensation from the pope, had espoused his own aunt, Donna Theresa de Tavora. Joseph Maria de Tavora was also involved in the guilt of his parents. The third principal concerned was Don Jeronymo de Attaide, conde of Attouguia, himself a relation and married to the eldest daughter of the marquis of Tavora. The characters of all those personages were unblemished and respectable, until this machination was detected.

In the course of investigating this dark affair, it appeared that the Duke de Aveiro had conceived a personal hatred to the king, who had disappointed him in a projected match between his son and a sister of the duke of Cadaval, a minor, and prevented his obtaining some commanderies which the late duke of Aveiro had possessed; that this nobleman, being determined to gratify his revenge against the person of his sovereign, had exerted all his influence and address in procuring the assistance of the malecontents: that, with this view, he had reconciled himself to the Jesuits, with whom he had been formerly at variance, knowing they were at this time implacably incensed against the king, who had dismissed them from their office of penitentiaries at court, and branded them with other marks of disgrace, on account of their illegal and rebellious practices in South America: that the duke had, moreover, insinuated himself into the confidence of the marchioness of Tavora, notwithstanding an inveterate rivalry of pride and ambition, which had long subsisted between the two families: that her resentment against the king was inflamed by the mortification of her pride in repeated repulses, when she solicited the title of duke for her husband: that her passions were artfully fomented and managed by the Jesuits, to whom she had resigned the government of her conscience; and they had persuaded her, that it would be a meritorious action to take away the life of a prince who was an enemy to the church, and a tyrant to his people: that she, being reconciled to the scheme of assassination, had exerted her influence in such a manner, as to inveigle her husband, her sons, and son-in-law, into the same infamous design; and yet this lady had been always remarkable for her piety, affability, and sweetness of disposition: that many consultations were held by the conspirators at the college of the Jesuits, St. Antao and St. Roque, as well as at the house of the duke and marquis: at last they resolved, that the king should be assassinated; and employed two ruffians, called Antonio Alvarez and Joseph Policarpio, for the execution of this design, the miscarriage of which we have related among the transactions of the preceding year.

In the beginning of January, before the circumstances of the conspiracy were known, the counts de Oberos and de Rebeira Grande were imprisoned in the castle of St. Julian, on a suspicion arising from from their freedom of speech. The dutchess of Aveiro, the countess of Attouguia, and the marchioness of Alorna, with their children, were sent to different nunneries; and eight Jesuits were taken into custody. A council being appointed for the trial of the prisoners, the particulars we have related were brought to light by the torture; and sentence of death was pronounced and executed upon the convicted criminals. Eight wheels were fixed upon a scaffold, raised in the square opposite to the house where the prisoners had been confined, and the thirteenth day of January was fixed for the day of execution. Antonio Alvarez Ferreira, one of the assassins who fired into the king's equipage, was fixed to a stake at one corner of the scaffold; and at the other was placed the effigies of his accomplice, Joseph Policarpio de Azevedos, who had made his escape. The marchioness of Tavora, being brought upon the scaffold between eight and nine in the morning, was, in compliment to her sex, beheaded at one stroke, and then covered with a linen cloth. Her two sons, and her son-in-law the count of Attouguia, with three servants of the duke de Aveiro, were first strangled at one stake, and afterwards broke upon wheels, where their bodies remained covered; but the duke and the marquis, as chiefs of the conspiracy, were broke alive, and underwent the most excruciating torments.

The last that suffered was the assassin Alvarez, who being condemned to be burnt alive, the combustibles, which had been placed under the scaffold, were set on fire, the whole machine with their bodies consumed to ashes, and these ashes thrown into the sea. The estates of the three unfortunate noblemen were confiscated, and their dwelling-houses razed to the ground. The name of Tavora was suppressed for ever by a public decree; but that of Mascarenha spared, because the duke de Aveiro was but a younger branch of the family. A reward of ten thousand crowns was offered to any person who should apprehend the assassin who had escaped; then the embargo was taken off the shipping. The king and royal family assisted at a public Te Deum, sung in the chapel of Nossa Senhora de Livramento; on which occasion the king, for the satisfaction of his people, waved his handkerchief with both hands, to shew he was not maimed by the wounds he had received.

Nor were the Portuguese ministry satisfied with these examples of justice. Without waiting for a bull from the pope, they sequestered all the estates and effects of the jesuits in that kingdom, which amounted to considerable sums, and reduced the individuals of the society to a very scanty allowance. Complaints of their conduct having been made to the pope, he appointed a congregation to examine into the affairs of the jesuits in Portugal. In the mean time, the court of Lisbon ordered a considerable number of them to be embarked for Italy, and resolved that no jesuit should hereafter reside within its realms. When these transports arrived at Civita Vecchia, they were, by the pope's order, lodged in the Dominican and Capuchin convents of that city, until proper houses could be prepared for their reception at Tivoli and Frascati. The most guilty of them, however, were detained close prisoners in Portugal.

From this retrospective view of the situation and complexion of the different courts of Europe, let us now turn our eyes to those operations of the war in which Great Britain and France were more peculiarly interested as principals. And here I shall deviate a little from my usual method of arrangement, by particularizing the most remarkable captures that were made upon the enemy by single ships during the course of this year, previous to my resuming the history of the more capital military transactions between the two nations; a deviation I thought necessary to adopt in this place, to prevent any interruption in the principal narrative.

In the month of February a French privateer belonging to Granville, called the Marquis de Marigny, having on board near two hundred men, and mounted with twenty cannon, was taken by captain Parker, commander of his majesty's ship the Montague, who likewise made prize of a smaller armed vessel, from Dunkirk, of eight cannon and sixty men. About the same period captain Graves, of the Unicorn, brought in the Moras privateer of St. Malo, carrying two hundred men and twenty-two cannon. Two large merchant ships, loaded on the French king's account, for Martinique, with provision, cloathing and arms, for the troops on that island, were taken by captain Lendrick, commander of the Brilliant; and an English transport from St. John's, having four hundred French prisoners on board, perished near the Western Islands. Within the circle of the same month a large French ship from St. Domingo, richly laden, fell in with the Favourite ship of war, and was carried into Gibraltar.

In the month of February captain Hood, of his majesty's frigate the Vestal, belonging to a small squadron commanded by admiral Holmes, who had sailed for the West Indies in January, being advanced a considerable way a-head of the fleet, descried and gave chase to a sail, which proved to be a French frigate called the Bellona, of two hundred and twenty men, and thirty-two great guns, commanded by the count de Beauhonoire. Captain Hood having made a signal to the admiral, continued the chase until he advanced within half musket-shot of the enemy, and then poured in a broadside, which was immediately returned. The engagement, thus begun, was maintained with great vigour on both sides for the space of four hours: at the expiration of which the Bellona struck, after having lost all her masts and rigging, together with about forty men killed in the action: nor was the victor in a much better condition; thirty men were killed and wounded on board of the Vestal. Immediately after the enemy submitted, all her rigging being destroyed by the shot, the top-mast fell overboard; and she was otherwise so damaged that she could not proceed on her voyage. Captain Hood therefore conducted his prize to Spithead, and afterwards met with a gracious reception from his majesty, on account of the valour and conduct he had manifested on this occasion. The Bellona had sailed in January from the island of Martinique, along with the Florissant, and another French frigate, from which she had been separated in the passage.

Immediately after this exploit, captain Elliot, of the Æolus frigate, accompanied by the Isis, made made prize of a French ship, the Mignonne, of twenty guns, and one hundred and forty men. She was one of four frigates employed as convoy to a large fleet of merchant ships, near the island of Rhée.

In the month of March the English frigates the Southampton and Melampe, commanded by the captains Gilchrist and Hotham, being at sea to the northward on a cruize, fell in with the Danae, a French ship of forty cannon, and three hundred and thirty men, which was attacked by captain Hotham in a ship of half the force, who maintained the battle a considerable time with admirable gallantry before his consort could come to his assistance. As they fought in the dark, captain Gilchrist was obliged to lie by for some time, because he could not distinguish the one from the other; but no sooner did the day appear than he bore down upon the Danae with his usual impetuosity, and soon compelled her to surrender. She did not strike, however, until thirty or forty of her men were slain; and the gallant captain Gilchrist had received a grape-shot in his shoulder, which though it did not deprive him of life, yet rendered him incapable of future service: a misfortune the more to be lamented, as it happened to a brave officer, in the vigour of his age, and in the midst of a sanguinary war, which might have afforded him many other opportunities of signalizing his courage for the honour and advantage of his country.

Another remarkable exploit was about the same time performed by captain Barrington, commander of the ship Achilles, mounted with sixty cannon, who, to the westward of Cape Finisterre, encountered a French ship of equal force, called the Count de St. Florentin, bound from Cape François, on the island of Hispaniola, to Rochefort, under the command of the sieur de Montay, who was obliged to strike, after a close and obstinate engagement, in which he himself was mortally wounded, a great number of his men slain, and his ship so much shattered, that she was with difficulty brought into Falmouth. Captain Barrington obtained the victory at the expence of about twenty-five men, killed and wounded, and all his rigging, which the enemy's shot had rendered useless.

Two small privateers from Dunkirk were also taken, one called the Marquis de Bareil, by the Brilliant, which carried her into Kinsale in Ireland; the other called the Carillonneur, which struck to the Grace cutter, assisted by the boats of the ship Rochester, commanded by captain Duff, who sent her into the Downs.

About the latter end of March captain Falkner, in the ship Windsor, of sixty guns, cruising to the westward, discovered four large ships to leeward, which, when he drew near them, formed the line of battle a-head, in order to give him a warm reception. He accordingly closed with the sternmost ship, which sustained his fire about an hour; then the other three bearing away with all the sail they could carry, she struck her colours, and was conducted to Lisbon. She proved to be the Duc de Chartres, pierced for sixty cannon, though at that time carrying no more than four and twenty, with a complement of three hundred men, about thirty of whom were killed in the action. She belonged, with the other three that escaped, to the French

East India company, was loaded with gun-powder and naval stores, and bound for Pondicherry.

Two privateers, called Chasseur and Le Conquerant, the one from Dunkirk, the other from Cherbourg, were taken and carried into Plymouth by captain Hughs, of his majesty's frigate the Tamer. A third, called the Dispatch, from Morlaix, was brought into Penzance by the Diligence sloop, under the command of captain Eastwood. A fourth, called the Basque, from Bayonne, furnished with twenty-two guns and above two hundred men, fell into the hands of captain Parker, of the Brilliant, who conveyed her into Plymouth. Captain Antrobus, of the Surprize, took the Vieux, a privateer of Bourdeaux; and a fifth, from Dunkirk, struck to captain Knight, of the Liverpool, off Yarmouth.

In the month of May a French frigate, called the Arethusa, mounted with thirty-two cannon, manned with a large complement of hands, under the command of the marquis de Vaudreuil, submitted to two British frigates, the Venus and the Thames, commanded by the captains Harrison and Colby, after a warm engagement, in which sixty men were killed and wounded on the side of the enemy. In the beginning of June an armed ship, belonging to Dunkirk, was brought into the Downs by captain Angel, of the Stag; and a privateer of force, called the Countess de la Serre, was attacked and taken, after an obstinate action, by captain Moore, of his majesty's ship the Adventure.

Several armed ships of the enemy and valuable prizes were taken in the West Indies; particularly two French frigates, and two Dutch ships with French commodities, all richly laden, by some of the ships of the squadron which vice-admiral Cotes commanded in the Jamaica station. A fifth, called the Velour, from St. Domingo, with a valuable cargo on board, being provided with twenty cannon, and above one hundred men, fell in with the Favourite sloop of war, under the command of captain Edwards, who, after an obstinate dispute, carried her in triumph to Gibraltar.

At St. Christopher's in the West Indies, captain Collingwood, commander of the king's ship the Crescent, attacked two French frigates, the Amythe and Berkeley; the former of which escaped, after a warm engagement, in which the Crescent's rigging was so much shattered that she could not pursue; but the other was taken, and conducted into the harbour of Basseterre.

Notwithstanding the vigilance and courage of the English cruisers in those seas, the French privateers swarmed to such a degree, that in the course of this year they took above two hundred sail of British ships, valued at six hundred thousand pounds sterling.

On the tenth of October the Hercules ship of war, mounted with seventy-four guns, under the command of captain Porter, cruising in the Chops of the Channel, discovered to windward a large ship, which proved to be the Florissant, of the same force with the Hercules. Her commander, observing the English ship giving chase, did not seem to decline the action, but bore down in an oblique direction, and the engagement began with great fury. In a little time the Hercules, having lost her topmast, and all her rigging being shot away, the enemy took advantage of this disaster, made the best of his way, and was pursued till eight o'clock next morning, when he escaped behind the isle of Oleron. Captain Porter had one man killed, was himself wounded in the head with a grapeshot, and lost the use of one leg in the engagement.

Having thus given an account of all the remarkable captures and exploits that were made and performed since the commencement of the present year, I shall now proceed to describe the actions that were at the same period achieved by the different squadrons that constituted the naval power of Great Britain. Intelligence having been received that the enemy had projected an invasion upon some of the British territories, and that a number of flat-bottomed boats were assembled at Havre de Grace for the purpose of transporting troops, rear-admiral Rodney was, in the beginning of July, detached with a small squadron of ships and bombs to annoy and overawe that part of the coast of France. He accordingly arrived in the road of Havre, and made dispositions to execute his orders. The bomb-vessels being moored in the narrow channel of the river leading to Honfleur, began to throw their shells, and continued the bombardment for fifty-two hours without intermission, during which a numerous body of French forces was employed in forming intrenchments, erecting new batteries, and firing both with shot and shells upon the assailants. The town was set on fire in several places, and burned with great violence; some of the boats were overturned, and a few of them reduced to ashes, while the inhabitants abandoned the place in the utmost consternation.

The honour of the British flag was still more effectually asserted by the gallant admiral Boscawen, who, as I have already remarked, was entrusted with the conduct of a squadron in the Mediterranean. It must be owned, however, that his first attempt was far from being successful. Having in vain displayed the British flag in sight of Toulon, by way of defiance to the French fleet that there rode at anchor, he ordered three ships of the line, commanded by the captains Smith, Harland, and Barker, to advance and burn two ships that lay close to the mouth of the harbour. They accordingly approached with great intrepidity, and were warmly received by a good number of batteries, which had before escaped their notice. Two small forts they attempted to destroy, and cannonaded for some time with great fury; but being overpowered by a superior fire, and the wind suddenly falling, they sustained considerable damage, and were towed off with great difficulty, in a very shattered condition. The admiral seeing three of his best ships so roughly handled in this enterprize, returned to Gibraltar in order to refit; and M. de la Clue, commander of the French squadron at Toulon, seized this opportunity of sailing, in hope of passing the Straights mouth unobserved, his fleet consisting of twelve large ships and three frigates.

Admiral Boscawen, who commanded fourteen sail of the line, with two frigates, and as many fire-ships, having repaired his squadron, detached one frigate to cruize off Malaga, and another to hover between Estepona and Ceuta point; with a view to keep a good look-out, and give timely notice in case the enemy should approach. On the seventeenth day of August, at eight in the evening, the Gibraltar frigate made a signal that fourteen sail appeared on the Barbary shore to the eastward of Ceuta; upon which the English admiral immediately weighed anchor and put to sea: at day-light he perceived seven large ships lying to; but when the English squadron forbore to answer their signal, they discovered their mistake, set all their sail and made the best of their way. This was the greater part of the French squadron commanded by M. de la Clue, from whom five of his large ships and three frigates had separated in the night. Even now perhaps he might have escaped, had he not been obliged to wait for the Souveraine, which was a heavy sailer.

At noon the wind, which had blown a fresh gale, suddenly subsided; and although admiral Boscawen had made signal to chase and engage in a line of battle a-head, it was not till half an hour after two that some of his headmost ships could overtake the rear of the enemy: which, though greatly overmatched in numbers, fought with uncommon bravery. The English admiral, without waiting to return the fire of the sternmost, which he received as he passed, used all his endeavours to come up with the Ocean, which Mr. de la Clue commanded in person; and about four o'clock in the afternoon running athwart her hawse, he poured into her a furious broadside: thus the engagement began with equal vigour on both sides. This dispute however was of short duration; in about half an hour admiral Boscawen's mizen-mast and top-sail-yards were shot away; and the enemy hoisted all the sail they could carry. Mr. Boscawen having shifted his flag from the Namur to the Newark, joined some other ships in attacking the Centaur of seventy-four cannon, which being thus overpowered, was obliged to submit.

The British admiral pursued them all night, during which the Souveraine and the Guerrier altered their course, and deserted their commander. At day-break, Mr. de la Clue, whose left leg had been broke in the engagement, perceiving the English squadron crowding all their sails in order to overtake him, and finding himself on the coast of Portugal, determined to burn his ships, rather than they should fall into the hands of the enemy. The Ocean was run ashore two leagues from Lagos, near the fort of Almadana, the commander of which fired three shots at the English; another captain of the French squadron followed the example of his commander; and both endeavoured to disembark their men; but the sea being rough, this proved a very tedious and difficult attempt. The captains of the Temeraire and Modeste, instead of destroying their ships, anchored as near as they could to the forts Exavier and Lagres, in hope of receiving their protection; but in this hope they were disappointed. Mr. de la Clue had been landed, and the command of the Ocean devolved upon the count de Carne, who, having sustained one broadside from the America, struck his colours, and the English took possession of this noble prize, the best ship in the French navy, mounted with eighty cannon. Captain Bentley of the Warspight, who had remarkably distinguished himself by his courage during the action of the preceding day, attacked the Temeraire of seventy-four guns, and brought her her off with little damage. Vice-admiral Broderick, the second in command, advancing with his division, burned the Redoubtable of seventy-four, which was bulged, and abandoned by her men and officers; but they made prize of the Modeste, carrying sixty-four guns, which had not been much injured in the engagement.

This victory was obtained by the English admiral at a very small expence of men; the whole number of the killed and wounded not exceeding two hundred and fifty on board of the British squadron; though the carnage among the enemy must have been much more considerable, as Mr. de la Clue, in his letter to the French ambassador at Lisbon, owns, that on board of his own ship the Ocean, one hundred men were killed on the spot, and seventy dangerously wounded: but the most severe circumstance of this disaster was the loss of four capital ships, two of which were destroyed, and the other two brought in triumph to England, to be numbered among the best bottoms of the British navy. What augmented the good fortune of the victors, was, that not one officer lost his life in the engagement. Captain Bentley, whom the admiral dispatched to England, with the tidings of his success, met with a gracious reception from the king, who knighted him for his gallantry.

As I intend to bring into one point of view all the naval transactions of the year, especially those that happened in the European seas, I must now, without regarding the order of time, delay the mention of some previous events of importance, and record the last action at sea, that in the course of this year was performed by the navy of Great Britain. The court of Versailles, in order to embarrass the British ministry, and divert their attention from all expeditions to the French coast, had in the winter projected a plan for invading some part of the British dominions; and in the beginning of the year had actually begun to make preparations in their different harbours, for carrying this design into execution. Even as far back as the latter end of May, messages from the king to both houses of parliament, were delivered by the earl of Holderness and Mr. Pitt, the two secretaries of state, importing that his majesty had received advice of preparations making by the French court, with a design to invade Great Britain; that, though persuaded by the universal zeal and affection of his people, any such attempt must, under the blessing of God, end in the destruction of those who engaged in it; yet he apprehended he should not act consistent with that paternal care and concern which he had always shewn for the safety and preservation of his subjects, if he omitted any means in his power, which might be necessary for their defence: he therefore acquainted the parliament with his having received intelligence of the enemy's preparations, to the end that his majesty might, if he should think proper, in pursuance of the late act of parliament, cause the militia, or such part thereof as should be necessary, to be drawn out and embodied, in order to march as occasion should require.

These messages were no sooner read, than each house separately resolved to present an address, thanking his majesty for having imparted this intelligence; assuring him that they would with their lives and fortunes support him against all attempts whatever: that warmed with affection and zeal for his person and government, and animated by indignation at the daring designs of an enemy, whose fleet had hitherto shunned the terror of the British navy, they would cheerfully exert their utmost efforts to repel all insults, and effectually enable their sovereign, not only to disappoint the attempts of France, but, by the blessing of God, turn them to their own confusion. The commons at the same time resolved upon another address, desiring his majesty would give directions to his lieutenants of the several counties, ridings, and places within South Britain, to employ their utmost diligence and attention in executing the several acts of parliament relating to the militia.

These and other precautionary steps were accordingly taken; but the government wisely placed their chief dependence upon the strength of the navy, part of which was so disposed and stationed, as to block up all the harbours of France, in which the enemy were known to make any naval preparations. I have observed in what manner rear-admiral Rodney visited the town and harbour of Havre de Grace, and alarmed that part of the coast in successive cruises: I have also given an account of the expedition and victory of admiral Boscawen over the squadron of La Clue, which was fitted out at Toulon, with design to assist in the projected invasion.

Notwithstanding this disaster, the French ministry persevered in their design; towards the execution of which, they had assembled another considerable fleet, at the harbours of Rochfort, Brest, and Port Louis, to be commanded by Mr. de Conflans, and reinforced by a numerous body of troops, which were actually drawn together under the Duc d'Aiguillon, at Vannes in Lower Bretagne. Flat-bottomed boats, and transports for the purpose, were collected in different ports on the coast of France; and a small squadron was equipped at Dunkirk, under the command of an enterprising adventurer, named Thurot, who had, in the course of the preceding year, distinguished himself by his courage and conduct in a large privateer, called the Belleisle, which had scoured the North Seas, taken a number of ships, and at one time maintained an obstinate engagement against two English frigates, which were obliged to desist, after having sustained considerable damage.

This man's name became a terror to the trading vessels of Great Britain; for his valour was not more conspicuous in battle than his conduct in eluding the pursuit of the British cruisers, who were successively sent in quest of him, through every port of the German ocean and Northern Sea, as far as the islands of Orkney. It must be acknowledged, likewise, for the honour of humanity, and in justice to this bold mariner, though destitute of the advantages of birth and education, he was eminently distinguished by his generosity and compassion to those who had the misfortune to fall under his power; and that his behaviour in every respect entitled him to a much more honourable rank in the service of his country. The court of Versailles were not insensible to his merit. He obtained a commission from the French king, and was intrusted with the command of the small armament now fitting out in the harbour of Dunkirk.

The British government, being timely informed of these particulars, took every measure that sagacity could suggest, or vigour execute, to defeat the purposed invasion. With this view, Thurot's armament at Dunkirk was watched by an English squadron in the Downs, commanded by commodore Boys; the port of Havre was guarded by rear-admiral Rodney; Mr. Boscawen had been stationed off Toulon; and the coast of Vannes was secured by a small squadron detached from Sir Edward Hawke, who had during the whole summer blocked up the harbour of Brest, where Conflans lay with his fleet, in order to be joined by the other divisions of the armament. These different squadrons of the British navy were connected by a chain of separate cruisers; so that the whole coast of France, from Dunkirk to the extremity of Bretagne, might be said to be subjected to an actual blockade.

The French ministry being thus over-awed, delayed their attempt upon Britain; and the projected invasion seemed to hang in suspense, till the month of August, in the beginning of which their army in Germany sustained a defeat on the plains of Minden. Their designs in that country being baffled by this disaster, they seemed to convert their chief attention to their sea armament; the preparations were resumed with redoubled vigour; and even after the defeat of La Clue, they resolved to try their fortune in a descent. They now proposed to disembark a body of troops in Ireland.

Thurot received orders to sail from Dunkirk with the first opportunity, and direct his course round the northern parts of Scotland, that he might alarm the coast of Ireland, and make a diversion from that part where Conflans intended to effect a landing. The transports and ships of war were collected at Brest and Rochfort, having on board a train of artillery, with saddles, and other accoutrements for cavalry, to be mounted in Ireland. A body of French troops, including part of the Irish Brigade, was kept in readiness to embark; and the young pretender, having agreed to the terms proposed by France, arrived in the neighbourhood of Vannes incognito, in order, once more, to hazard his person, and excite a revolt in the dominions of Great-Britain.

The execution of this scheme was, however, prevented by the vigilance of Sir Edward Hawke, who blocked up the harbour of Brest, with a fleet of twenty-three capital ships; while another squadron of smaller ships and frigates, under the command of captain Duff, continued to cruise along the French coast from port L'Orient in Bretagne to the point of St. Gilles in Poitou. At length, however, in the beginning of November, the British squadron commanded by Sir Edward Hawke, Sir Charles Hardy, and rear admiral Geary, were forced from the coast of France by stress of weather, and anchored in Torbay.

The French admiral Conflans seized this opportunity of sailing from Brest, with one and twenty sail of the line, and four frigates, in hope of being able to destroy the English squadron commanded by captain Duff, before the larger fleet could return from the coast of England. Sir Edward Hawke having received intelligence that the French fleet had departed from Brest, immediately stood to sea, in order to pursue them; and in the mean time, the government issued orders for guarding all those parts of the coast that were thought the most exposed to a descent. The land forces were put in motion, and quartered along the shore in Kent and Sussex; all the ships of war in the different harbours, even those that had just arrived from America, were ordered to put out to sea, and every step was taken to disappoint the designs of the enemy.

While these measures were taken with equal spirit and circumspection, Sir Edward Hawke steered his course directly for Quiberon, on the coast of Bretagne, which he supposed would be the rendezvous of the French: but notwithstanding his utmost efforts, he was driven by a hard gale considerably to the westward, where he was joined by two frigates, the Maidstone and Coventry. These he ordered to keep a-head of the squadron. The weather growing more moderate, the former made the signal for seeing a fleet, on the twentieth day of November, at half an hour past eight o'clock in the morning, and in an hour afterwards discovered them to be the enemy's squadron. They were at that time in chace of captain Duff's squadron, which now joined the large fleet, after having been in some danger of being taken. Sir Edward Hawke, who, when the Maidstone gave the first notice, had formed the line a-breast, now observing, that the French admiral endeavoured to escape with all the sail he could crowd, threw out a signal for seven of his ships that were nearest the enemy to chace, and endeavour to detain them, until they could be reinforced by the rest of the squadron, which were ordered to form into a line of battle a-head, as they advanced, that no time might be lost in the pursuit.

Considering the roughness of the weather, which was extremely tempestuous; the nature of the coast, which in this place is sown thick with sand banks, shoals, rocks, and islands, as entirely unknown to the British sailors, as they were familiar to the French navigators; the dangers of a short day, dark night, and lee shore; it required an uncommon degree of resolution in the English admiral to attempt hostilities on this occasion: but Sir Edward Hawke, prompted by the innate bravery of his own heart, animated by a warm love for his country, and well acquainted with the importance of the stake on which the safety of his country in a great measure depended, was determined to run every risque in endeavouring to frustrate at once a boasted scheme projected for the annoyance of his fellow-subjects.

With regard to his ships of the line, he had but the advantage of one in point of number, and was rather inferior in the article of men and metal; consequently Mr. de Conflans might have hazarded a fair battle on the open sea, without any imputation of temerity; but he thought proper to play a more artful game, though it did not succeed according to his expectation. He kept his fleet in a body, and retired close in shore, with a view to draw the English squadron among the shoals and islands, on which he hoped they would pay dear for their rashness and impetuosity, while he and his officers, who were perfectly acquainted with the navigation, could either stay, and take advantage of the disaster, or if hard pressed, retire through channels unknown to the British pilots.

At half an hour after two, the van of the English fleet began the engagement with the rear of the enemy, in the neighbourhood of Belleisle. Every ship as she advanced poured in a broad side on the sternmost of the French, and bore down upon their van, leaving the rear to those that came after. Sir Edward Hawke, in the Royal George of one hundred and ten guns, reserved his fire in passing through the rear of the enemy, and ordered his master to bring him along-side of the French admiral, who commanded in person on board of the Soleil Royal, a ship mounted with eighty cannon, and furnished with a complement of twelve hundred men.

When the pilot remonstrated that he could not obey his command, without the most imminent risque of running upon a shoal, the gallant Hawke replied, "You have done your duty in shewing the danger; now you are to obey my order, and lay me along-side the Soleil Royal." His wish was gratified: the Royal George ranged up with the French admiral. The Thésée, a French seventy-four gun ship, generously put herself between them: Hawke was obliged to bestow upon her the fire he had reserved for a greater occasion, and at one broadside sunk her to the bottom. The same was the fate of the Superbe, another French ship of seventy guns.

Notwithstanding the boisterous weather, a good number of ships on both sides fought with equal fury and dubious success, till about four in the afternoon, when the Formidable struck her colours. The Heros took the same step, in token of submission, and dropped anchor; but the wind was so high, that no boat could be sent effectually to secure the conquest. By this time day-light began to fail, and the greater part of the French fleet escaped under cover of the night.

Night approaching, the storm continuing to increase on a lee-shore, and the British squadron being surrounded by unknown shoals and islands, Sir Edward Hawke made the signal for anchoring to the westward of the small island Dumet; and here the fleet remained all night, in a very dangerous riding, alarmed by the fury of the tempest, and the incessant firing of guns of distress, without knowing whether it proceeded from friend or enemy. The Soleil Royal had, under favour of the night, anchored likewise in the midst of the British squadron; but, at day-break, Mr. de Conflans ordered her cable to be cut, and she drove ashore to the westward of Crozie. The English admiral immediately made signal to the Essex to slip cable, and pursue her; and, in obeying this order, she ran unfortunately on a sand-bank, called Lefour, where the Resolution, another ship of the British squadron, was already grounded. Here they were both irretrievably lost, in spite of all the assistance that could be given: but all their men, and part of their stores, were saved, and the wreck set on fire by order of the admiral. He likewise detached the Portland, Chatham, and Vengeance, to destroy the Soleil Royal, which was burned by her own people, before the English ships could approach; but they arrived time enough to reduce the Heros to ashes on the Lefour, where she had been also stranded; and the Juste, another of their great ships, perished in the mouth of the Loire.

The admiral, observing seven large ships of the enemy riding at anchor between Point Penvas and the mouth of the river Vilaine, made the signal to weigh, in order to attack them; but the fury of the storm increased to such a degree, that he was obliged to remain at anchor, and even order the top-gallant masts to be struck. In the mean time, the French ships being lightened of their cannon, their officers took advantage of the flood, and a more moderate gale under the land, to enter the Vilaine, where they lay within half a mile of the entrance, defended by some occasional batteries erected on the shore, and by two large frigates, moored across the mouth of the harbour. There they were effectually protected from any attempts of small vessels; and as for large ships, they could not approach so near as to reach them with their metal.

On the whole, this battle, in which a very small number of lives was lost, may be considered as one of the most glorious and important actions that ever happened in any war between the two nations: for it not only defeated the projected invasion, with which the island of Great Britain had been so long threatened; but it gave the finishing blow to the naval power of France, which was thenceforward rendered totally incapable of undertaking any enterprise of importance.

As for the British admiral, he continued cruising off the coast of Bretagne for a considerable time after the victory he had gained, taking particular care to block up the mouth of the river Vilaine, that the seven French ships might not escape, and join Mr. Conflans, who made shift to reach Rochfort with the shattered remains of his squadron. Sir Edward Hawke, having undergone a long and dangerous conflict with tempestuous weather, was at length recalled, and presented to his sovereign, who gratified him with a considerable pension, for the courage and conduct he had so often and so signally displayed in the service of his country; and his extraordinary merit was afterwards honoured with the solemn thanks of the parliament.

The people of France were so dispirited by the discomfiture of their army at Minden, and the defeat of their squadron at Lagos, that the ministry of Versailles thought proper to conceal the greatness of their last misfortune under a palliating detail published in the Gazette of Paris, as a letter from Mr. Conflans to the count de St. Florentin, secretary of the marine. In this egregious misrepresentation their admiral was made to affirm, that the British fleet consisted of forty ships of the line of battle, besides frigates; that the Soleil Royal had compelled the Royal George to sheer off; that the seven ships, which retreated into the river Vilaine, had sustained very little damage, and would be soon repaired; and that, by the junction of Bompart's squadron, he should be soon able to give a good account of the English admiral. Such were the pitiful shifts which the French ministry were obliged to employ, in order to save themselves the mortification of confessing the irreparable loss they had suffered.

The alarm of the French invasion, which was thus so happily disconcerted, not only affected the tranquillity of Great Britain, but also communicated itself to the kingdom of Ireland, where it gave occasion to some public disorder. In the latter end of October the two houses of parliament, having assembled at Dublin, received a formal message from the duke of Bedford, lord-lieutenant of that kingdom, importing, that, by a letter from the secretary of state, written by his majesty's express command, it appeared that France, far from resigning her plan of invasion, on account of the disaster that befel her Toulon Squadron, was more and more confirmed in her purpose, and even instigated by despair itself, to attempt, at all hazards, the only resource she seemed to have left, for thwarting, by a diversion at home, the measures of England abroad, in prosecuting a war which had hitherto opened, in all parts of the world, so unfavourable a prospect to the views of French ambition: that, in case the body of French troops, amounting to eighteen thousand men, under the command of the duc d'Aiguillon, assembled at Vannes, where also a sufficient number of transports was prepared, should be able to elude the British Squadron, Ireland would, in all probability, be one of their chief objects; his grace thought it therefore incumbent upon him, in a matter of such high importance to the welfare of that kingdom, to impart this intelligence to the Irish parliament: that his majesty made no doubt but that the zeal of his faithful Protestant subjects in that kingdom, had been already sufficiently quickened by the repeated accounts received of the enemy's dangerous designs, and actual preparations, at a vast expence, in order to invade the several parts of the British dominions: that his grace had received his sovereign's commands to use his utmost endeavours to animate and excite his loyal people of Ireland to exert their well-known zeal and spirit in support of his majesty's government, and in defence of all that was dear to them, by timely preparation to resist and frustrate any attempts of the enemy to disturb the quiet, and shake the security of this kingdom: he, therefore, in the strongest manner, recommended it to them to manifest, upon this occasion, that zeal for the present happy establishment, and that affection for his majesty's person and government, by which the parliament of that nation had been so often distinguished.

This message was no sooner read, than the house of commons unanimously resolved to present an address to the lord lieutenant, thanking his grace for the care and concern he had shewn for the safety of Ireland, in having communicated intelligence of so great importance; desiring him to make use of such means as should appear to him the most effectual for the security and defence of the kingdom; and assuring him, that the house would make good whatever expence should be necessarily incurred for that purpose.

This intimation, and the steps that were taken in consequence of it, for the defence of Ireland, produced such apprehensions and distraction among the people of that kingdom, as had well nigh proved fatal to the public credit. In the first transports of popular fear, there was such an extraordinary run upon the banks of Dublin, that several considerable bankers were obliged to stop payment; and the circulation was in danger of being entirely stagnated, when the lord lieutenant, the members of both houses of parliament, the lord mayor, aldermen, merchants, and principal traders of Dublin, engaged in an association to support public credit, by taking the notes of bankers in payment: a resolution which effectually answered the purpose intended.

Whatever hopes the court of Versailles might have conceived, that their invading army would in Ireland be reinforced by a great number of the natives, in all probability their expectations would have been wholly disappointed, had they even been able to effect a landing; for no signs of disaffection to the reigning family appeared at this juncture. On the contrary, the wealthy individuals of the Romish persuasion offered voluntarily to furnish the government with large sums of money, in case of necessity, to support the present establishment against all its enemies; and the Roman catholics of the city of Corke, in a body, presented an address to the lord lieutenant, expressing their loyalty in the warmest terms of affection. After having congratulated his grace on the unparalleled successes which had attended his majesty's arms, and expressed their sense of the king's paternal tenderness for his kingdom of Ireland, they acknowledged, with the deepest sense of gratitude, that protection and indulgence they had enjoyed under his majesty's mild and auspicious reign. They professed the warmest indignation at the threatened invasion of the kingdom by an enemy, who, grown desperate from repeated defeats, might possibly make that attempt as a last effort, vainly flattered with the imaginary hope of assistance in Ireland, from the former attachments of their deluded predecessors. They assured his grace, in the most solemn manner, that such schemes were altogether inconsistent with their principles and intentions: that they would, to the utmost exertion of their abilities, with their lives and fortunes, join in the defence and support of his majesty royal person and government against all invaders whatsoever: that they should be always ready to concur in such measures, and to act such parts, in defence of the kingdom, in common with the rest of his majesty's subjects, as his grace in his great wisdom should be pleased to appoint; and think themselves particularly happy to be under the direction and command of so known an assertor of liberty, such an important and distinguished governor. Finally, they expressed the most earnest wish, that his majesty's arms might be crowned with such a continuance of success, as should enable him to defeat the devices of all his enemies, and obtain a speedy and honourable peace. This loyal address, which was transmitted to the earl of Shannon, and by him presented to the duke of Bedford, could not fail to be very agreeable to the government at such a critical conjuncture.

Although no signs of disaffection to his majesty's family appeared on this trying occasion, it must nevertheless be acknowledged, that a spirit of dissatisfaction broke out with extraordinary violence among the populace of Dublin. Whether they were dissatisfied with the conduct of the lord lieutenant, whose character was by no means popular, or began to entertain suspicions of the designs of the English ministry; certain it is, great pains were taken to infuse into them a belief, that an union would soon be effected between Great Britain and Ireland; in which case this last kingdom would be deprived of its parliament and independency, and be subjected to the same taxes that were imposed upon the people of England.

This

This notion enraged the populace to such a degree, that they assembled in a tumultuous manner, broke into the house of lords, insulted the peers, seated an old woman on the throne, and searched for the Journals, which, had they found them, they would in all probability have committed to the flames. Not content with this outrage, they compelled the members of both houses, whom they met in the streets, to take an oath that they would never consent to such an union, or give any vote contrary to the true interest of Ireland. Several coaches belonging to obnoxious persons were destroyed, and their horses killed; and a gibbet was erected for one gentleman in particular, who narrowly escaped the ungovernable rage of those furious insurgents. A body of horse and infantry were drawn out on this occasion, in order to disperse the multitude, who accordingly retired to their own habitations. Next day addresses were presented to the lord-lieutenant by both houses of parliament, and a committee of enquiry appointed, that the ringleaders of the tumult might be speedily apprehended and brought to condign punishment.

When the ministry of England received the first intelligence of Thurot's having sailed from Dunkirk with a small squadron of armed ships, and a body of land troops, designed for a private expedition on the coast of Scotland or Ireland, expresses were immediately sent to the commanding officers of the forces in North Britain, with orders to put the forts along the coast of that kingdom in the best posture of defence, and to hold every thing in readiness to repel the enemy, should they attempt to effect a landing. In consequence of these instructions, beacons were erected for the more easy communicating the alarm; places of rendezvous appointed for the regular troops and militia; and strict orders issued that no officer should absent himself from his duty, on any pretence whatsoever. The greatest encomium that can be given to the reputation of this adventurer, is an account of the terror which the sailing of his puny armament diffused through the whole extent of such a powerful kingdom, whose fleets covered the ocean. Perhaps Thurot's career would have been sooner checked, had commodore Boys been victualled for a longer cruise; but this commander was obliged to put in at Leith for a supply of provisions, at the very time when Thurot was seen hovering upon the coast near Aberdeen; and before the English squadron was ready to resume its cruise, the other had taken shelter at Gottenburg in Sweden.

Having thus given a succinct detail of the actions performed in the European seas by the naval force of Great Britain, within the compass of the present year, I shall now proceed to relate the exploits of the British arms within the tropics, and particularly the expedition to Martinico and Guadalupe, which is said to have succeeded even beyond the expectation of the ministry. A plan had been laid for improving the success of the preceding year in North America, by carrying the British arms up the river St. Laurence, and attacking Quebec, the capital of Canada. The armament allotted for the reduction of Martinico and Guadalupe constituted part of this design, inasmuch as the troops employed in that expedition were, in case of a failure in the first attempt, intended to reinforce the British army in North America, which was justly regarded as the chief seat of the war.

What hope of success the ministry entertained from an attack upon Martinico may be easily conjectured from the state of that island, as it appeared in a memorial presented by the French king's lieutenants of its several districts to the general of the French islands, in consequence of an order issued in November, for holding them in readiness to march and defend the island from the English, of whose designs they were fully apprised. They represented, that the trade with the Dutch was become their sole dependance: that they could expect no succour from Europe, by which they had been abandoned ever since the commencement of the war: that the traders, vested with the privilege of trafficking among them, had abused the intention of the general, and, instead of being of service to the colony, had fixed an arbitrary price for all the provisions they had brought in, as well as for the commodities which they exported; so that the former was valued at as high a price as their avarice could exact, and the latter sunk as low in value as their own selfish hearts could desire: that the colony for two months had been destitute of all kinds of provision; the commodities of the planters lay upon their hands, and their negroes were in danger of perishing through hunger; a circumstance which excited the apprehension of the most dreadful consequences: that to slaves half-starved, all kinds of bondage were equal; and people reduced to such a situation were often driven to despair, seeking, in anarchy and confusion, a remedy from the evils by which they were oppressed: that the best provided of the inhabitants laboured under the want of the common necessities of life; and others had not so much as a grain of salt in their houses: that there was an irreparable scarcity of slaves to cultivate their lands; and the planters were reduced to the necessity of killing their cattle to support the lives of those who remained alive; so that the mills were no longer worked, and the inhabitants consumed beforehand what ought to be reserved for their sustenance, in case of being blocked up by the enemy.

They desired therefore that the general would suppress the permissions granted to particular merchants, and admit neutral vessels freely into their ports, that they might trade with the inhabitants unmolested and unrestrained. They observed, that the citadel of Port Royal seemed the principal object on which the safety and defence of the country depended; as the loss of it would be necessarily attended with the reduction of the whole island: they therefore advised that this fort should be speedily furnished with every thing necessary for its safety and defence; and that magazines of provision, as well as ammunition, should be established in different quarters of the island.

From this remonstrance it plainly appears, that the island was wholly unprepared to repel the meditated invasion, and that the plan adopted by the ministry of Great Britain was founded on the best and most authentic intelligence. The regular troops of Martinico amounted to about twenty independent companies, greatly defective in point of number. The militia was composed of burghers and planters, distressed and dissatisfied, intermixed with a parcel of wretched negroe slaves, groaning under the most intolerable misery, from whence they could have no hope of deliverance but by a speedy change of masters; their magazines were empty, and their fortifications out of repair.

Such was the state of Martinico, when the inhabitants every day expected a visit from the British armament, whose progress I shall now describe. On the twelfth day of November, in the preceding year, captain Hughes sailed from St. Helen's with eight sail of the line, one frigate, four bomb-ketches, and a fleet of transports, having on board six regiments of infantry, and a detachment of artillery, besides eight hundred marines distributed among the ships of war; this whole force being under the command of major-general Hopson, an old experienced officer, assisted by major-general Barrington, the colonels Armiger and Haldane, and the lieutenant-colonels Trapaud and Clavering, acting in the capacity of brigadiers. After a voyage of seven weeks and three days, the fleet arrived at Barbadoes, and anchored in Carlisle-bay, where they joined commodore Moore, who, in consequence of his majesty's express instructions for that purpose, assumed the command of the united squadrons, consisting of ten ships of the line, besides frigates and bomb-ketches.

Ten days were consumed in supplying the fleet with wood and water, in reviews, reimbarcations, councils of war, assemblies of the council belonging to the island, in issuing proclamations, and beating up for volunteers. At length, every great ship being reinforced with forty negroes, to be employed in drawing the artillery; and the troops, which amounted to five thousand eight hundred and twenty-four men, being joined by four hundred Highlanders belonging to the second battalion of the regiment commanded by lord John Murray in North America, the whole armament sailed from Carlisle-bay on the thirteenth day of January: but by this time the troops, unaccustomed to a hot climate, were considerably weakened and reduced by fevers, diarrhoeas, the scurvy, and the small-pox; which last disease had unhappily broke out amongst the transports. Next morning the squadron came in sight of the island of Martinico, which was the place of its destination, lying in the latitude of fifteen degrees north, extending about thirteen leagues in length and seven in breadth, divided quite across by a lofty ridge of mountains, well watered with streams and rivulets, extremely fertile in its soil, which produces sugar, cotton, ginger, and indigo; indented with commodious bays, of which the most considerable is the great bay of Port Royal, the capital of the island, seven miles long, and in some places five miles over.

Martinico is still further considerable by its central situation in the midst of the Caribbees, by its strength, the number of its inhabitants, and the advantages it derives from being the seat of government, and staple of trade, from whence even the sugars of Guadalupe and other French islands are exported for the European markets. The chief fortification of the island was the citadel of Port Royal, a regular fort, garrisoned by four companies which hardly amounted to the number of one hundred and fifty men, thirty-six bombar-diers, eighty Swiss, and fourteen officers. Their whole store of provision consisted of only one hundred barrels of beef, and they were entirely destitute of all other necessaries. They were almost wholly unprovided with water in the cisterns, with spare carriages for their cannon, match, wadding, and langrage; they had but a small stock of other ammunition, and the walls were in many parts decayed. The only preparations they had made for defence were some paultry intrenchments formed at St. Pierre, and a place called Casnavire, where they imagined the descent would probably be attempted.

On the fifteenth day of the month the British Squadron entered the great bay of Port Royal, some of the ships being exposed to the shot of a battery erected on the Ile de Ranieres; a little island about half way up the bay. At their approach, the Floissant, of seventy-four guns, which had been so roughly handled by captain Tyrrel in the Buckingham, then lying under the guns of Fort Negro, along with two frigates, turned up under the citadel, and came to anchor in the Carenage, behind the fortification. One of the frigates, during the ensuing night, made her escape through the transports, and directed her course for Europe.

Next day three ships of the line were ordered to attack Fort Negro, a battery at the distance of three miles from the citadel, which, being mounted with seven guns only, was soon silenced, and immediately possessed by a detachment of marines and sailors; who, being landed, in flat-bottomed boats, clambered up the rock, and entered through the embrasures with their bayonets fixed: here, however, they met with no resistance. The enemy had abandoned the fort with precipitation. The British colours were immediately hoisted, and centinels of marines posted upon the parapet. The next care was to spike and disable the cannon, break the carriages, and destroy the powder which they found in the magazine: nevertheless the detachment was ordered to keep possession of the battery. This service being successfully performed, three ships were sent to reduce the other battery at Casnavire, which consisted only of four guns, and these were soon rendered unserviceable.

The French troops, reinforced by militia, which had been detached from the citadel to oppose the landing, observing the whole British Squadron, and all the transports, already within the bay, and Fort-Negro possessed by the marines, withdrew to Port Royal, leaving the beach open; so that the English troops were disembarked without opposition, and, being formed, advanced into the country towards Fort Negro, in the neighbourhood of which they lay all night upon their arms; while the fleet, which had been galled by bomb-shells from the citadel, shifted their station, and stood farther up the bay.

By ten next day the English officers had brought up some field-pieces to an eminence, and scoured the woods, from whence the troops had been greatly annoyed by the small shot of the enemy during the best part of the night, and all that morning. At noon the British forces advanced, in order, towards the hill that overlooked the town and citadel of Port Royal, and sustained a troublesome fire from enemies they could not see; for the French militia were entirely concealed among the trees and bushes. This eminence, called the Morne Tortuefon, though the most important post of the whole island, was neglected by the general of Martinico, who had also determined to blow up the fortifications of the place: but, luckily for the islanders, he had not prepared the materials for this operation, which must have been followed by the immediate reduction of the capital, and indeed of the whole country. Some of the inferior officers, sensible of the importance of the Morne Tortuefon, resolved to defend that post with a body of the militia, which had been joined by the garrisons of Fort Negro and Cafenavire, as well as by some soldiers detached from the Florissant: but notwithstanding all their endeavours, as they were entirely destitute of cannon, extremely deficient in point of discipline, disheartened by the pusillanimity of their governor, and in a great measure disconcerted by the general consternation that prevailed among the inhabitants, in all probability they could not have withstood a spirited and well conducted attack.

The English army, however, met with much greater obstruction from the nature of the ground than from the strength of the enemy. The whole country was intersected with a number of gullies, inclosed by steep and almost perpendicular precipices; so that it was extremely difficult for the troops to advance, and absolutely impossible for them to transport their artillery. The general, therefore, sent word to the commodore, that he could not maintain his ground, unless the squadron would supply him with heavy cannon, landed near the town of Port Royal, or assist him in attacking the citadel by sea, while he should make his approaches by land. Both these expedients being deemed impracticable, the attempt upon Port Royal was forthwith abandoned, and the troops being recalled from their advanced posts, were re-embarked in the evening without molestation.

The majority of the British officers, who composed the council of war, having given it as their opinion, that it might be for his majesty's service to make an attack upon St. Pierre, the fleet proceeded to that part of the island, and entered the bay on the nineteenth. The commodore told the general, that he made no doubt of being able to reduce the town of St. Pierre: but, as the ships might be disabled in the attack, so as not to be in a condition to proceed immediately on any other material service; as the troops might also be reduced in their numbers, so as to be incapable of future attacks; as, even upon the supposition of its being taken, the general seemed apprehensive of his not being able to garrison the place; and as the reduction of the island of Guadalupe would be of great benefit to the sugar colonies; Mr. Moore proposed that the armament should immediately proceed to this island; and the general agreed to the proposal. Before this resolution was taken, however, the commodore had ordered the bay of St. Pierre to be sounded, and directed the Rippon to advance, and silence a battery situated a mile and a half to the northward of the town. Accordingly captain Jekyl, who commanded that ship, stood in, and anchoring close to the shore, attacked it with such impetuosity, that in a few minutes it was abandoned. At the same time the Rippon was exposed to the fire of two other small batteries, from which she received considerable damage both in her hull and rigging; and was in great danger of running aground, when orders were given to tow her out of danger.

The whole armament having abandoned the design on Martinico, directed their course to Guadalupe, another of the Caribbee islands, lying at the distance of thirty leagues to the westward, about fifteen leagues in length, and twelve in breadth; divided into two parts by a channel, which the inhabitants cross in a ferry-boat. The western division is distinguished by the appellation of Basseterre, or Guadalupe properly so called; and here the metropolis stands, defended by the citadel and other fortifications. The eastern part, called Grandterre, is destitute of fresh water, which abounds in the other division, and is secured by fort Louis, with a redoubt, which commands the road in the district of Gosier. The gut, or canal that separates the two parts, is known by the name of the Salt River, having a road or bay at each end; the one called the great Cul de Sac, the other the small Cul de Sac. Guadalupe is covered with high mountains and precipices, to which the inhabitants used to convey their valuable effects in time of danger: but here are also beautiful plains, watered by brooks and rivers, which fertilize the soil, enabling it to produce a great quantity of sugar, cotton, indigo, tobacco, and cassia; besides plenty of rice, potatoes, all kinds of pulse and fruit peculiar to the island. The country is populous and flourishing, and the government comprehends two smaller islands, called All Saints, and Deseada, which appear at a small distance from the coast, on the eastern side of the island.

The British squadron arrived at Basseterre on the twenty-second day of January; and the chief engineer having reconnoitred the town, pronounced it absolutely impregnable to shipping. The commodore, however, was of another opinion. Having disposed his ships in proper order, he resolved to attack it early next morning. At nine, the Lion, commanded by captain Trelawney, began the engagement against a battery of nine guns; and the rest of the fleet continued to draw up a-breast of the other batteries and the citadel, which mounted forty-six cannon, besides two mortars. The action in a little time became general, and was maintained on both sides for several hours with great vivacity: while the commodore, who had shifted his flag into the Woolwich frigate, kept aloof without gunshot, that he might be the more disengaged to view the state of the battle, and give his orders with the greater precision.

During the whole attack, all the sea commanders behaved with extraordinary spirit and resolution, particularly the captains Leslie, Burnet, Gayton, Jekyl, Trelawney, and Shuldham; who, in the very hottest of the action, distinguished themselves equally by their courage and deliberation. About five in the afternoon, the fire of the citadel was exhausted. The Burford and Berwick were driven out to sea; so that captain Shuldham in the Panther was unsupported; and two batteries played upon the Rippon, captain Jekyl, who, by two in the afternoon, silenced the guns of one called the Mornerouge; but at the same time could not prevent his ship from running a-ground. The enemy observing her disaster, assembled in great numbers on the the hill, and lined the trenches, from whence they poured in a severe fire of musquetry. The militia afterwards brought up a cannon of eighteen pound ball; and for two hours raked her fore and aft with considerable effect: nevertheless captain Jekyl returned the fire with equal spirit and perseverance; and being assisted by captain Leslie, of the Bristol, found means at last to get out of all danger. At seven in the evening, all the other large ships having silenced the guns to which they had been respectively opposed, he joined the rest of the fleet. The four bomb-ketches being anchored near the shore, began to ply the town with shells and carcasses; so that in a little time the houses were in flames; the magazines of gun-powder blew up with the most terrible explosion; and about ten o'clock the whole place was involved in one general conflagration.

Next day, at two in the afternoon, the fleet arrived in the road of Basseterre, where they found the hulls of divers ships which the enemy had set on fire at their approach: several ships turned out and endeavoured to escape, but were intercepted and taken by the English squadron. At five the troops landed without opposition, and took possession of the town and citadel, which they found entirely abandoned. They learned from a Genoese deserter, that the regular troops of the island consisted of five companies only, the whole amounting to a very inconsiderable number; and that they had laid a train to blow up the powder magazine in the citadel; but had been obliged to retreat with such precipitation, as did not permit them to execute this design. The train was immediately cut off, and the magazine secured. The nails with which they had spiked up their cannon were drilled out by the matrosses; and in the mean time the British colours were hoisted on the parapet. Part of the troops took possession of an advantageous post on an eminence, and part entered the town, which still continued burning with great violence.

In the morning, at day-break, the enemy appeared, to the number of two thousand, about four miles from the town, and began to throw up intrenchments in the neighbourhood of a house where the governor had fixed his head quarters, declaring he would maintain his ground to the last extremity. To this resolution indeed he was encouraged by the nature of the ground, and the neighbourhood of a pass called the Dos d'Ane, a cleft through a mountainous ridge, opening a communication with Capesterre, a more level and beautiful part of the island. The ascent from Basseterre to this pass was so very steep, and the way so broken and interrupted by rocks and gullies, that there was no prospect of attacking it with success, except at the first landing, when the inhabitants were seized with the most terrible panic. They soon, however, recovered their wonted spirit, assembled and fortified themselves among the hills, armed and arrayed their negroes, and affected to hold the invaders at defiance. A flag of truce being sent with offers of terms to their governor, the chevalier d'Etreil, he rejected them in a letter, with which his subsequent conduct but very ill corresponded. Indeed from the beginning his deportment had been such as gave no very favourable idea of his character. When the British squadron advanced to the attack, instead of visiting in person the citadel and the batteries, in order to encourage and animate his people by his exhortation and example, he retired out of the reach of danger to a distant plantation, where he remained a tame spectator of the destruction that overwhelmed the capital of the island. Next morning, when he ought to have exerted himself in preventing the disembarkation of the English troops, who had a difficult shore and violent surf to encounter, and when he might have defended the entrenchments and lines which had been made to oppose their landing, he abandoned all these advantages, and took shelter among the mountains that were deemed inaccessible.

But however pusillanimous the conduct of the governor, certain it is the inhabitants behaved with great spirit and activity in defence of their country. They continually harassed the scouring detachments, by firing upon them from woods and sugar plantations. Their armed negroes in particular were very expert in this kind of bush-fighting. The natives or militia appeared in considerable parties, and even attacked detached bodies of the British army. A lady of masculine courage, whose name was Ducharmy, having armed her slaves, headed them in person, made several bold attempts upon an advanced post possessed by major Melville, and threw up intrenchments upon a hill opposite to the station of this officer, who had all along distinguished himself by his intrepidity, vigilance, and conduct. At length the works of this virago were stormed by a regular detachment, which, after an obstinate and dangerous conflict, entered the intrenchment sword in hand, and burned the houses and plantations; but the lady, who commanded in person during the action, escaped with some difficulty. Some of the enemy were killed, and a good number taken; of the English detachment twelve soldiers were slain, and thirty wounded, including three subaltern officers, one of whom lost his arm.

The greatest body of the enemy was posted at the governor's head quarters, where they had raised a redoubt, and formed some intrenchments. From these a considerable detachment advanced on the sixth day of February, in the morning, towards the citadel, and fell in with an English party, whom they attacked with great vivacity; but after a short, though warm dispute, they were obliged to retire with the loss of some men. Without all question the inhabitants of Guadalupe pursued the most feasible plan that could possibly have been concerted for their own safety. Instead of risking a general engagement with regular troops, in which in all probability they would have been defeated, they resolved to weary them out, by maintaining a kind of petty war in separate parties, to alarm and harass the English with hard duty in a sultry climate, where they were but indifferently supplied with provision and refreshment. Both the army and navy were attacked with fevers and other diseases epidemical in those hot countries; and the regimental hospitals were so crowded, that it was found absolutely necessary to send five hundred sick men to the island of Antigua, where they might be properly attended.

In the mean time, the reduction of the islanders on the side of Guadalupe becoming every day more difficult, the general resolved to transfer the seat of war to the eastern and more fertile part of the island, called Grand-terre, which, as I have already observed, was secured by a strong battery, named Fort Louis. In pursuance of this plan, the great ships were sent round to Grand-terre, in order to reduce this fortification, which they accordingly attacked on the thirteenth day of February. After a severe cannonading, which lasted six hours, a body of marines being landed, with the Highlanders, they drove the enemy from their intrenchments sword in hand, and, taking possession of the fort, hoisted the English colours.

In a few days after this exploit, general Hopson dying at Basseterre, the chief command devolved upon general Barrington, who determined to prosecute the entire reduction of the island with the utmost vigour and dispatch. The better to facilitate this conquest, the commodore ordered two ships of war to cruize off the island of St. Eustatia, and prevent the Dutch traders from assisting the natives of Guadalupe, whom they had hitherto constantly supplied with provisions since they withdrew to the mountains. General Barrington, on the very first day of his command, ordered the troops who were encamped to strike their tents and build huts, that the enemy might imagine he intended to continue in this quarter; but in a few days the batteries in and about Basseterre were blown up and destroyed, the detachments recalled from the advanced posts, and the whole army reembarked, except one regiment, with a detachment of artillery, left in garrison at the citadel; the command of which was conferred on colonel Debrisay, an accomplished officer of great experience.

The enemy no sooner observed the coast clear than they rushed down from the hills, and endeavoured to make themselves masters of the town, from which however they were driven by the fire of the citadel. They afterwards erected a battery, from whence they annoyed this fortification both by shot and shells, and even threatened a regular attack; but as often as they approached the place, they were repulsed by sallies from the castle. In the midst of these hostilities, the gallant Debrisay, together with major Trollop, one lieutenant, two bombardiers, and several common soldiers, were blown up, and perished by the explosion of a powder magazine at the flanked angle of the south-east bastion. The confusion necessarily produced by such an unfortunate accident, encouraged the enemy to come pouring down from the hills, in order to take advantage of the disaster; but they were soon repulsed by the fire of the garrison. The general, being made acquainted with the fate of colonel Debrisay, bestowed the government of the fort upon major Melvil, and sent thither the chief engineer to repair and improve the fortifications.

In the mean time, commodore Moore having received certain intelligence that monsieur de Bompert had arrived at Martinico with a squadron, consisting of eight sail of the line and three frigates, having on board a whole battalion of Swiss, and some other troops, to reinforce the garrisons of the islands, he called in his cruizers, and sailed immediately to the bay of Dominique, an island to the windward, at the distance of nine leagues from Guadalupe, whence he could always be able to oppose any attempts which the French commander might make against the operations of the British armaments. Some reflections were thrown on his conduct for retiring so speedily to this station, and not rather advancing directly to attack the French squadron; but these censures appeared, in the sequel, to have proceeded either from prejudice or ignorance.

General Barrington being by this time left with one ship of forty guns, for the protection of the transports, concerted a plan of prosecuting the war in Guadalupe by detachments; and the success fully answered his expectation. He determined to make a descent on the division of the island called Grand-terre, and for that purpose allotted six hundred men, who, under the command of colonel Crump, landed between the towns of St. Anne and St. François, and demolished some batteries of the enemy, from whence he met with very little opposition. While he was employed in this service, a detachment of three hundred men attacked the town of Gosier, which, notwithstanding a severe fire, they took by assault, drove the garrison into the woods, set fire to the place, and destroyed the battery and intrenchment raised for its defence. This exploit being happily achieved, the detachment was ordered to force their way to Fort Louis, while the garrison of that castle was directed to make two sallies, in order to favour their irruption. They accordingly penetrated with some loss, sustained in forcing a strong pass, and took possession of a battery which the enemy had raised against the English camp, in the neighbourhood of Fort Louis.

The general, having hitherto succeeded in his designs, formed the scheme of surprising at once the three towns of Petitbourg, Guoyave, and St. Mary, situated on the Basse-terre side of the little Cul de Sac, and entrusted the execution of it to the colonels Crump and Clavering: but the night appointed for the service, proved extremely dark and tempestuous, and the negro conductors were so frightened, that they ran several of the flat-bottomed boats on the shoals that skirt this part of the island. Colonel Clavering landed with about eighty men; but found himself so entangled with mangrove-trees, and the mud so impassably deep, that he was obliged to reembark, though not before the enemy had discovered his design. This project having failed, the general detached the same commanders, whose gallantry and conduct cannot be sufficiently extolled, with a detachment of fifteen hundred men, including one hundred and fifty volunteers from Antigua, to land in a bay not far from the town of Arnenville, at the bottom of the little Cul de Sac, under the protection of his majesty's ship the Woolwich. The enemy made no opposition to their landing; but retreated, as the English advanced, to a strong intrenchment thrown up behind the river Lecorne, a post of the utmost importance, as it commanded the whole country as far as the bay Mahaut, where provisions and supplies of all sorts were landed from St. Eustatia. The river was rendered inaccessible by a morass, covered with mangroves, except at two narrow passes, which they had secured with a redoubt, and intrenchments well pallisaded, mounted with cannon, and defended by a numerous militia: besides, the narrow roads, through which only they could be attacked, were intersected with deep and wide ditches.

Notwithstanding these obstructions, the English commanders resolved to hazard an assault. While four field-pieces and two howitzers maintained a constant fire upon the top of the intrenchments, the regiment of Duroure and the Highlanders advanced under this cover, firing by platoons with the utmost regularity. The enemy, intimidated by their cool and resolute behaviour, began to abandon the first intrenchment on the left. Then the Highlanders, drawing their swords, and sustained by part of the regiment, threw themselves in with their usual impetuosity, and followed the fugitives pell-mell into the redoubt, of which they took possession: but the enemy still kept their ground within the intrenchments on the right, from whence they annoyed the assailants both with musquetry and cannon. In half an hour, an occasional bridge being made, the English troops crossed the river in order to attack this post, which the enemy abandoned with precipitation: notwithstanding all their haste, however, about seventy were taken prisoners, and among these some of the most considerable inhabitants of the island. This advantage cost the English two officers and thirteen men killed, and about fifty wounded.

The roads being mended for the passage of the artillery, the troops proceeded towards Petit-bourg, harrassed in their march by flying bodies of the enemy, and arrived late at night on the banks of the river Lizarde, the only ford of which the French had secured with strong intrenchments, defended by a battery of four cannon, erected on a rising ground in the rear. Colonel Clavering, while he amused them all night at this place by a constant fire into their lines, transported in two canoes, which he launched about a mile and a half farther down the river, a sufficient number of troops, by day-break, to attack them on the other side in flank, while he should charge them in front at the head of his little army; but they did not think proper to sustain the assault. On the contrary, they no sooner discovered his intention than they deserted the post, and fled with precipitation. Colonel Clavering having crossed the river, pursued them to Petit-bourg, which they had also fortified; and here he found captain Uvedale, of the Grenada bomb-ketch, throwing shells into the redoubt. He instantly sent detachments to occupy the neighbouring heights; a circumstance which the enemy no sooner perceived than they abandoned the place, and retired in disorder.

On the fifteenth day of April captain Steele destroyed a battery at Guoyave, a strong post, which, though it might have been defended against an army, the French relinquished abruptly, after having made a hasty discharge of their artillery. At the same time colonel Crump was detached with seven hundred men to the bay of Mahaut, where he burned the town and batteries, which he found abandoned, together with a vast quantity of provisions which had been brought from the island of St. Eustatia. Colonel Clavering, having left a small garrison at Petit-bourg, began his march on the twentieth day of the month towards St. Mary's, where he understood the enemy had assembled their whole force, thrown up intrenchments, and raised barricadoes; but they had left their rear unguarded. The English commander immediately detached colonel Barlow with a body of troops to attack them from that quarter, while he himself advanced against the front of their intrenchment. They stood but one cannon-shot, and fled to their lines and batteries at St. Mary's, the flanks of which were secured with woods and precipices. When they observed the English troops endeavouring to surmount these difficulties, and turn their lines, they quitted them, in order to oppose the design; and were immediately attacked with such vivacity, in the face of a severe fire of musquetry and cannon, that they abandoned their ground, and fled in the utmost confusion, leaving the field and all their artillery to the victors, who took up their quarters for the night at St. Mary's.

Next day they entered the fertile country of Capesterre, where eight hundred and seventy negroes, belonging to one planter, surrendered at discretion. Here colonel Clavering was met by messieurs de Clainvilliers and Duqueruy, deputed by the principal inhabitants of the island, to know what capitulation would be granted. These he conducted to Petit-bourg, where they were presented to general Barrington, who, considering the absence of the fleet, the small number of his forces daily diminishing, the nature of the country, and the possibility of the enemy's being reinforced from Martinico, wisely took advantage of their present panic, and settled the terms of capitulation without delay. The sanity of this resolution was soon visible. The inhabitants had just signed the agreement, when a messenger arrived in their camp with intelligence that M. de Beauharnois, the general of the French islands, had landed at St. Anne, to the windward, with a reinforcement from Martinico, consisting of six hundred regulars from Europe, and about fifteen hundred militia, with a great supply of arms and ammunition, mortars, and artillery, under convoy of the squadron commanded by M. de Bomparr, who no sooner heard that the capitulation was signed than he reembarked the troops and stores with all possible expedition, and sailed back to Martinico.

Thus we see that the conquest of this important island, which is said to produce a greater quantity of sugar than any other of the West Indian plantations, was as much owing to accident as to the valour of the troops and the conduct of the general: for, had the reinforcement arrived an hour sooner than it actually landed, in all probability the English would have found it extremely difficult to complete the reduction of Guadalupe. Whatever be in this, certain it is that the inhabitants manifested great gallantry in the defence of their country, and no less fortitude in bearing their subjection now that it was inevitable. They immediately quitted the Dos d'Ane, and all their other posts, and returned to their respective habitations.

The town of Basseterre being entirely reduced to ashes, the inhabitants began to clear away the rubbish, and erected occasional sheds, where they resumed their several occupations with that good humour so peculiar to the French nation; and general Barrington humanely indulged them with all the assistance in his power.

Soon after the reduction of Guadalupe, the islands of Deteada, Los Santos, and Marigalante, were summoned to surrender; and they accordingly submitted upon the same terms which was granted to the great island: but this step was not taken till after the departure of general Barrington for England.

This officer having happily completed the reduction of Guadalupe, sent word to the commodore that he intended to send back part of the troops with the transports to Great Britain about the beginning of July. In consequence of this intimation, Mr. Moore sailed with his squadron to Basseterre road, where he was next day joined by two ships of the line from England, which rendered him superior in strength to the commander of the French squadron, who at this time retired to the island of Grenada, lying about eight leagues from Guadalupe. Here he was discovered by the ship Rippon, whose captain returned immediately to Basseterre, in order to inform the commodore of this circumstance: but before he could put to sea, a frigate arrived with advice that Bompard had departed from Grenada, and was supposed to have directed his course to Hispaniola. The commodore immediately dispatched the Ludlow-castle with this intelligence to admiral Cotes, who commanded the squadron at Jamaica.

General Barrington having made a tour of Guadalupe, in order to visit and repair the fortifications which he thought necessary to be maintained, and the affairs relating to the inhabitants being entirely settled, he sent the Highlanders, with a body of draughts, to North America, under convoy; he garrisoned the principal towns of the island, and left the chief command to colonel Crump, who had for some time acted as brigadier-general, colonel Clavering having been sent home to England with the news of the conquest. Colonel Melville, who had distinguished himself in a remarkable manner ever since their first landing, continued governor of the citadel at Basseterre; and the command at Grand-terre was bestowed on colonel Delgarno. Three complete regiments were assigned as a sufficient guard for the whole island, and the other three were embarked for England. General Barrington himself went on board the Roebuck in the latter end of June, and with the transports, under convoy of a small squadron, set sail for Great Britain, while commodore Moore with his larger fleet directed his course to Antigua.

During these transactions in the Leeward Islands, the war was carried on with no less vigour in North America, which may be properly considered as the chief scene of action. In October of the preceding year a grand assembly had been held at Easton, about ninety miles from Philadelphia; and there peace was concluded, by a formal treaty, between Great Britain and the several nations of Indians inhabiting the country between the Apalachian mountains and the lakes. The Twightwees, however, settled between the river Ohio and the lakes, did not assist at this interview, though some steps had been taken to secure the alliance of that people. The conferences were managed by the governors of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, accompanied by sir William Johnson's deputy for Indian affairs, four members of the council of Pennsylvania, six members of the assembly, two agents for the province of New Jersey, a great number of planters and citizens of Philadelphia, chiefly quakers. They were met by the deputies and chiefs of the Mohawks, Oneidoes, Onondagoes, Cayagas, Se-necas, Tuscaroras, Nanticoques, and Conoys; the Tuteloes, Chugnuts, Delawares, and Unamies; the Minisinks, Mohicons, and Wappingers; the whole number, including their women and children, amounting to five hundred and seven.

Some of the Six Nations thinking themselves aggrieved by the British colonists, who had imprisoned some of their countrymen, killed a few, and treated others with neglect, did not fail to express their resentment, which had been artfully fomented by the French emissaries, even into an open rupture. The Delawares and Minisinks in particular complained that the English had encroached upon their lands, and on that account were provoked to hostilities: but Teedyuscung, the chief of the former, had made overtures of peace; and, in the character of ambassador from all the ten nations, had been very instrumental in forming this assembly. The chiefs of the Six Nations, though very well disposed to peace, took umbrage at the importance assumed by this chief of the Delawares, over whom, as their descendants, they claimed a kind of parental authority; and on this occasion they made no scruple to express their displeasure. The business therefore of the English governors, at this congress, was to ascertain the limits of the lands in dispute, reconcile the Six Nations with their nephews the Delawares, remove every cause of misunderstanding between the English and the Indians, detach these savages entirely from the French interest, establish a firm peace, and induce them to exert their influence in persuading the Twightwees to accede to this treaty.

Those Indians, though possessed of few ideas, circumscribed in their mental faculties, stupid, brutal, and ferocious, conduct themselves nevertheless, in matters of importance to the community, by the general maxims of reason and justice; and their treaties are always founded upon good sense, conveyed in a very ridiculous manner. Their language is guttural, harsh, and polysyllabical; and their speech consists of hyperbolical metaphors and similes, which invest it with an air of dignity, and heighten the expression. They manage their conferences by means of wampum, a kind of bead, formed of hard shells, either in single strings, or sewed in broad belts of different dimensions, according to the importance of the subject. Every proposition is offered, every answer made, every promise corroborated, every declaration attested, and every treaty confirmed, by producing and interchanging these belts of wampum.

The conferences were continued from the eighth to the twenty-sixth day of October, when every article was settled to the mutual satisfaction of all parties. The Indian deputies were gratified with a valuable present, consisting of looking-glasses, knives, tobacco-boxes, sleeve-buttons, thimbles, sheers, gun-locks, ivory combs, shirts plain and ruffled, shoes and stockings for men and women, hats, caps, handkerchiefs, thread, cloaths, blankets, gartering, serges, watch-coats, and a few suits of laced cloaths for their chieftains. To complete their happiness, the stores of rum were opened: they drank themselves into a state of brutal intoxication, and next day returned in peace to their respective places of habitation.

This

This treaty with the Indians, who had been debauched from the interest of Great Britain, happily contributed to facilitate the operations which had been projected against the French settlements in Canada. Instead of employing the whole strength of the British arms in North America upon one object, the British ministry resolved to divide the forces, and make impressions on three different parts at once, that the enemy might be divided, distracted, and weakened, and the conquest of Canada accomplished in one campaign. In order the more effectually to insure success, the different expeditions were planned in such a manner as to co-operate with each other occasionally; so practicable was it thought for them to maintain such a correspondence as would admit of a junction of this nature.

The project of this campaign imported, that general Wolfe, who had distinguished himself so eminently in the siege of Louisbourg, should proceed up the river St. Laurence as soon as the navigation should be clear of ice, with a body of eight thousand men, and a considerable squadron of ships from England, to undertake the siege of Quebec, the capital of Canada: that general Amherst, who commanded in chief, should, with another army of regular troops and provincials, amounting to twelve thousand men, reduce Ticonderoga and Crown-Point, cross the lake Champlain, and, proceeding along the river Richelieu to the banks of St. Laurence, join general Wolfe in the siege of Quebec: that brigadier-general Prideaux, with a third body, reinforced by a considerable number of friendly Indians, assembled by the influence and under the command of sir William Johnson, should attack the French fort erected by the fall of the cataract of Niagara, which was certainly the most important post of all French America, as it in a manner commands all the interior parts of that vast continent. It overawes the whole country of the Six Nations, who were persuaded to agree to its being built on their territory: it secured all the inland trade, the navigation of the great lakes, the communication between Canada and Louisiana, and opened a way for inroads into the colonies of Great Britain. It was proposed that the British forces, having taken Niagara, should be embarked on the lake Ontario, sail down the river St. Laurence, reduce the town of Montreal, and then join or co-operate with Amherst's army. Besides these larger armaments, colonel Stanwix was entrusted with a smaller detachment for subduing smaller forts, and scouring the banks of the lake Ontario.

The same good fortune that so remarkably attended the British arms in the conquest of Guadalupe, seemed to accompany them in a manner still more astonishing in the siege of Quebec, the particulars of which we shall relate in their proper place: at present, we must explain the operations of general Amherst, whose separate army was first in motion, though such impediments were thrown in his way as greatly retarded the progress of his armament.

The summer was already far advanced before he could pass lake George with his forces, and reach the neighbourhood of Ticonderoga, where in the preceding year the British troops had sustained such a terrible disaster. At first the enemy seemed determined to defend this fortress; but perceiving the English commander resolute, cautious, and well prepared for undertaking the siege, having moreover orders to retreat, from place to place, towards the centre of operations at Quebec, rather than run the risk of being made prisoners of war; they, in the night of July the 27th, abandoned the post, after having in some measure demolished the fortifications, and retired to Crown Point, a fort situated on the banks of Lake Champlain. General Amherst having taken possession of this important post, which effectually secured the frontiers of New York, and afforded to himself a safe retreat in case of necessity, ordered the works to be repaired, and allotted a strong garrison for its defence. This acquisition, however, was not made without the loss of a brave accomplished young officer, colonel Roger Townshend, who, in reconnoitring the fort, was killed with a cannon shot, and fell near the same spot which, in the former year, had been enriched with the blood of the gallant lord Howe, whom he strongly resembled in the circumstances of birth, age, qualifications, and character.

While the general superintended the repairs of Ticonderoga, and the men were employed in constructing batteaus and other vessels, his scouting parties hovered in the neighbourhood of Crown-Point, in order to watch the motions of the enemy. From one of these detachments he received information on the first day of August, that the enemy had abruptly left Crown-Point. He forthwith detached a body of rangers before him to take possession of the place, embarked with the rest of his army, and on the fourth day of the month landed at the fort, where the troops were immediately encamped. His next care was to lay the foundations of a new fort, to be maintained for the security of the British dominions in that part of the country, and particularly for guarding against the inroads of scalping parties, by whom the plantations had been dreadfully infested.

Here he likewise received intelligence that the enemy had retired to the isle Aux Noix, at the other end of the lake Champlain, five leagues on the hither side of St. John's: that their force encamped in that place, under the command of M. de Burlemaque, consisted of three battalions and five piquets of regular troops, with Canadians and marines, amounting in the whole to three thousand five hundred effective men, provided with a numerous artillery; and that the lake was occupied by four large vessels, mounted with cannon, and manned with piquets of different regiments, under the command of M. le Bras, a captain in the French navy, assisted by M. de Rigal, and other sea officers. In consequence of this intimation, the English general, who had for some time employed captain Loring to superintend the building of vessels at Ticonderoga, being determined to have the superiority on the lake, directed the captain to build, with all possible dispatch, a sloop of sixteen guns, and a radeau eighty-four feet in length, capable of carrying six large cannon.

These, together with a brigantine, being finished, victualled, and manned, by the eleventh day of October, the general embarked with the whole troops in batteaus, in order to attack the enemy; but next day, the weather growing tempestuous, he

he was forced to take shelter in a bay on the western shore, where the men were landed for refreshment. In the mean time captain Loring, with his small squadron, sailed down the lake, gave chase to a French schooner, and drove three of their ships into a bay, where two of them were sunk, and the third run aground by their own crews, who escaped. This last, however, was repaired and brought away by captain Loring; so that now the French had but one schooner left. General Amherst, after having been some days wind-bound, reembarked his forces, and proceeded down the lake; but the storm which had abated beginning to blow with redoubled fury, so as to swell the waves mountain high, the season for action being elapsed, and winter setting in with a most severe frost, he saw the impossibility of executing his design, and was obliged to desist.

Returning to the same bay where he had formerly taken shelter, he landed the troops, and began his march for Crown-Point, where he arrived on the twenty-first day of October. Having attained a superiority on the lake, he now employed all his attention in raising the new fortress at Crown-Point, together with three small out-forts for its better defence; in forming roads of communication with Ticonderoga, and the governments of the Massachusetts and New Hampshire; and in making dispositions for the winter-quarters of his troops, so as to secure the country from the inroads of the enemy. During this whole summer he received not the least intelligence of Mr. Wolfe's operations, except a few hints in some intercepted letters of the French general Montcalm, relating to the exchange of prisoners. From these he learned that Mr. Wolfe had landed in the neighbourhood of Quebec, and seemed determined to undertake the siege of that city: that he had honoured him (the French general) with several notes, sometimes couched in a soothing strain, sometimes filled with menaces: that the French army intended to give him battle; and a few days would determine the fate of Quebec.

Though Mr. Amherst was ignorant of the proceedings of the Quebec squadron, he enjoyed nevertheless a free communication with the forces employed against Niagara, and had the satisfaction to hear of their success before he quitted the lines of Ticonderoga. General Prideaux, with his body of troops, reinforced by the Indian auxiliaries under sir William Johnson, advanced to the cataract of Niagara without meeting with the least opposition on his march; and investing the French fortress about the middle of July, carried on his approaches with great vigour till the twentieth day of that month, when, visiting the trenches, he was unfortunately killed by the bursting of a cohorn. Mr. Amherst was no sooner apprised of his disaster than he detached from Ticonderoga brigadier-general Gage, to assume the command of that army. In the mean time it devolved to sir William Johnson, who, though in a great measure unacquainted with the rules of war, prosecuted the plan of his predecessor with all the skill and activity of the most veteran commander.

The enemy, alarmed with the apprehension of losing a place of such importance, resolved to exert their endeavours for its relief. They collected a body of regular troops, amounting to twelve hundred men, drawn from Detroit, Venango, and Presque Isle; and these, with a number of Indian auxiliaries, were detached, under the command of monsieur d'Aubry, on an attempt to reinforce the garrison of Niagara. Sir William Johnson having received intelligence of their design, made a disposition to intercept them in their march. In the evening he ordered the light infantry and piquets to post themselves to the left, on the road leading from Niagara falls to the fortress; and these were reinforced in the morning with the grenadiers, and part of the forty-sixth regiment, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Massey; and another regiment, under lieutenant-colonel Farquhar, was posted at the tail of the works, in order to support the guard of the trenches. About eight in the morning, the enemy being in sight, the Indians in the English army advanced to speak with their countrymen who served under the French banners; but this conference was declined by the enemy. Then the French Indians having uttered the horrible scream called the war-whoop, which by this time had lost its effect among the British forces, the enemy began the action with great impetuosity: but they met with such a warm reception in front, while the Indian auxiliaries fell upon them in flank, that in a little more than half an hour their whole army was routed, their general, with all his officers, taken, and the pursuit continued through the woods for several miles with considerable slaughter.

This battle, which happened on the twenty-fourth day of July, having been fought in sight of the French garrison at Niagara, sir William Johnson sent major Harvey with a trumpet to the commanding officer, to present him with a list of the seventeen officers taken in the engagement, and advise him to surrender before more blood was shed, while he had it in his power to restrain the Indians. The commandant having certified himself of the truth, by sending an officer to visit the prisoners, agreed to treat, and in a few hours the capitulation was signed. The garrison, consisting of six hundred and seven effective men, marched out with the honours of war, in order to be embarked in vessels on the lake, and conveyed in the most expeditious manner to New York. They laid down their arms when they embarked, but were permitted to keep their baggage, and, by a proper escort, protected from the savage insolence and rapacity of the Indians. All the women were conducted, at their own request, to Montreal; and the sick and wounded, who could not bear the fatigue of travelling, were treated with humanity.

This was the second complete victory gained, in the course of the same war, by sir William Johnson, who, without the help of a military education, succeeded so signally in the field by dint of innate courage and natural sagacity. What remarkably distinguished these battles, is the circumstance of his having taken in both the commander of the enemy. Nor was he more serviceable to his country by his valour and conduct in the field, than by the influence and authority which his justice, benevolence, and integrity, had acquired him among the Indian tribes of the Six Nations, whom he not only assembled at Niagara, to the number of eleven hundred, but also restrained within the bounds of good order and moderation.

SUPPLEMENT for the LAKES of CANADA.

The reduction of Niagara, and the possession of Crown-Point, were exploits much more easily accomplished than the conquest of Quebec, the great object to which all these subordinate operations tended, and of which we now come to give an account. It was about the middle of February that a considerable squadron sailed from England for Cape Breton, under the command of the admirals Saunders and Holmes, two gentlemen of worth and probity, who had on several occasions signalized their courage and conduct in the service of their country. By the twenty-first day of April they were in sight of Louisbourg: but the harbour was blocked up with ice in such a manner, that they were obliged to bear away for Halifax in Nova Scotia. From thence rear-admiral Durell was detached with a small squadron, to sail up the river St. Laurence as far as the isle de Coudres, in order to intercept any supplies from France intended for Quebec: he accordingly took some store-ships; but he was anticipated by seventeen sail of ships, loaded with provision, stores, and some recruits, under convoy of three frigates, which had already reached the capital of Canada. Mean while, admiral Saunders arrived at Louisbourg; and the troops being embarked, to the number of eight thousand, proceeded up the river without further delay.

The operations at land were intrusted to the conduct of major-general James Wolfe, who had so eminently distinguished himself at the siege of Louisbourg; and his subordinates in command were the brigadiers Monckton, Townshend, and Murray; all four in the flower of their age, who had studied the military art with equal application and proficiency, and though young in years, were old in experience. The first was a soldier by descent, the son of major-general Wolfe, a veteran officer of acknowledged capacity: the other three resembled each other, not only in years, qualifications, and station, but also in family-rank, all three being the sons of noblemen. The situation of brigadier Townshend was singular: he had served abroad in the last war with reputation, and resigned his commission during the peace, in disdain of some hard usage he had received from his superiors. That his military talents, however, might not be lost to his country, he exercised them with equal spirit and perseverance in projecting the plan of a national militia. When the command and direction of the army devolved to a new leader, so predominant in his breast was the spirit of patriotism and the love of glory, that though heir-apparent to a British peerage, possessed of a very affluent fortune, remarkably dear to his acquaintance, and solicited to a life of quiet by every allurements of domestic felicity, he nobly disregarded these meaner considerations: he burst from all entanglements; proffered his service to his sovereign; exposed himself to the perils of a disagreeable voyage, the rigours of a severe climate, and the hazards of a campaign peculiarly fraught with toil, danger, and difficulty.

The armament intended for Quebec sailed up the river St. Laurence without any interruption, or having encountered any of those difficulties and perils with which the navigation of that river had been said to be attended. Their good fortune in this particular, indeed, was owing to some excellent charts of the river, which had been found in vessels taken from the enemy. About the latter end of June the land forces were disembarked in two divisions upon the isle of Orleans, situated a little below Quebec, a large fertile island, well cultivated, producing plenty of grain, abounding with people, villages, and plantations. General Wolfe no sooner landed on the island of Orleans than he distributed a manifesto among the French colonists, importing, That the king his master, justly exasperated against the French monarch, had equipped a considerable armament in order to humble his pride, and was determined to reduce the most considerable French settlements in America: that it was not against the industrious peasants, their wives and children, nor against the ministers of religion, that he intended to make war: on the contrary, he lamented the misfortunes to which they must be exposed by the quarrel: he offered them his protection, and promised to maintain them in their temporal possessions, as well as in the free exercise of their religion, provided they would remain quiet, and take no part in the difference between the two crowns. He observed, that the English were masters of the river St. Laurence, so as to intercept all succours from Europe; and had, besides, a powerful army on the continent, under the command of general Amherst: that the resolution they ought to take was neither difficult nor doubtful, as the utmost exertion of their valour would be useless, and serve only to deprive them of the advantages which they might reap from their neutrality: that the cruelties exercised by the French upon the subjects of Great Britain in America, would excuse the most severe reprisals; but Britons were too generous to follow such barbarous examples. He again offered to the Canadians the sweets of peace amidst the horrors of war; and left it to themselves to determine their own fate by their own conduct. He expressed his hope that the world would do him justice, should they oblige him, by rejecting these favourable terms, to adopt violent measures. He expatiated upon the strength and power, as well as the generosity of Great Britain, in thus stretching out the hand of humanity; a hand ready to assist them on all occasions, even when France was, by her weakness, compelled to abandon them in the most critical conjuncture.

This declaration produced no immediate effect, nor indeed could the Canadians be persuaded to depend upon the sincerity and faith of a nation whom their priests had industriously represented as the most savage and cruel enemy on earth. Possessed of those notions, which prevailed even among the better sort, they chose to abandon their habitations, and expose themselves and families to certain ruin, in provoking the English by the most cruel hostilities, rather than be quiet, and confide in the general's promise of protection. Instead of pursuing this prudent plan of conduct, they joined the scalping parties of Indians who skulked among the woods, and issuing forth among the English stragglers, butchered them with the most inhuman barbarity. Mr. Wolfe, whose nature revolted against such wanton and perfidious cruelty, sent a letter to the French general, representing, that such enormities were contrary to the rules of war established among civilized nations, dishonour-able to the service of France, and disgraceful to human nature: he therefore desired the French colonists and Indians might be restrained within due bounds, otherwise he would burn their villages, desolate their plantations, and retaliate upon the persons of his prisoners whatever cruelty should, in the sequel, be committed on the soldiers or subjects of his master. In all probability the French general's authority was not sufficient to bridle the ferocity of the savages, who continued to scalp and murder with the most brutal appetite for blood and revenge; so that Mr. Wolfe, in order to intimidate the enemy into a cessation of these outrages, found it necessary to connive at some irregularities in the way of retaliation.

M. de Montcalm, who commanded the French troops, though superior in number to the English, wisely determined to depend upon the natural strength of the country, rather than run the risk of a general engagement in the field. The city of Quebec was skilfully fortified, defended with a numerous garrison, and plentifully supplied with provision and ammunition. Montcalm had reinforced the troops of the colony with five regular battalions, formed of the best of the inhabitants; and completely disciplined all the Canadians of the neighbourhood capable of bearing arms, with the several tribes of savages. With this army he had taken post, in a very advantageous situation, along the shore of Beaumont, from the river St. Charles to the Falls of Montmorenci, every accessible part of his camp being deeply intrenched. To undertake the siege of Quebec against such odds and advantages, was not only a deviation from the established maxims of war, but a rash enterprize, seemingly repugnant to the dictates of common sense.

Mr. Wolfe was well acquainted with all the difficulties of the undertaking; but he knew at the same time he should always have it in his power to retreat, in case of emergency, while the British squadron maintained its station in the river: he was not without hope of being joined by general Amherst; and he was stimulated by an appetite for glory, which no prospect of danger could entirely overcome. Understanding that there was a body of the enemy posted with cannon at the Point of Levi, on the south shore, opposite to the city of Quebec, he detached against them brigadier Monckton, at the head of four battalions, who passed the river at night; and next morning, having skirmished with some of the enemy's irregulars, obliged them to retire from that post, which the English immediately occupied. At the same time colonel Carlton, with another detachment, took possession of the western point of the island of Orleans; and both these posts were fortified, in order to anticipate the enemy, who, had they kept possession of either, might have rendered it impossible for any ship to lie at anchor within two miles of Quebec. Besides, the Point of Levi was within cannon-shot of the city, against which a battery of mortars and artillery was immediately erected. Montcalm, foreseeing the effect of this expedient, detached a body of sixteen hundred men across the river, to attack and destroy the works before they were completed: but this detachment fell into disorder, fired upon each other, and fled in the utmost confusion. The battery being finished without further interruption, the cannon and mortars began to play with such success, that in a little time the upper town was considerably damaged, and the lower town entirely demolished.

Mean while, the fleet was exposed to the most imminent danger. Immediately after the landing the troops on the island of Orleans, the wind increased to a furious storm, which blew with such violence that many transports ran foul of one another, and were disabled; a number of boats and small craft foundered, and several large ships lost their anchors. The enemy resolving to take advantage of the confusion produced, as they believed, by this terrible tempest, prepared seven fire-ships, and at midnight sent them down from Quebec among the transports, which lay so thick as to cover the whole surface of the river. The scheme, though well contrived and seasonably executed, was entirely defeated by the vigilance of the British admiral, and the dexterity of his mariners, who resolutely boarded the fire-ships, and towed them fast ashore, where they lay burning to the water's edge, without having done the least prejudice to the English squadron. On the very same day of the succeeding month, they sent down a raft of fire-ships, or radeaus, which were likewise consumed, without producing any effect.

The works for the security of the hospital, and the stores on the island of Orleans, being completed, the British forces crossed the north channel in boats, and landing under the cover of two sloops, encamped on the side of the river Montmorenci, which separated them from the left of the enemy; and next morning a company of rangers, posted in a wood to cover some workmen, were attacked by the French Indians, and put to flight: however, the nearest troops advancing, repulsed the Indians in their turn with considerable loss. The reasons that induced general Wolfe to chuse this situation by the Falls of Montmorenci, in which he was divided from Quebec by this and another river called St. Charles, he explained in a letter to the secretary of state. He observed that the ground he had chosen was high, and in some measure commanded the opposite side, on which the enemy was posted: that there was a ford below the falls, passable in every tide for some hours at the latter part of the ebb, and beginning of the flood; and he hoped that means might be found of passing the river higher up, so as to fight the marquis de Montcalm upon less disadvantageous terms than those of directly attacking his intrenchments. Accordingly, in reconnoitring the river Montmorenci, a ford was discovered about three miles above; but the opposite bank, which was naturally steep and covered with woods, the enemy had fortified in such a manner as to render it almost inaccessible. The escorte was twice attacked by the Indians, who were as often repulsed; but these rencounters cost the English about forty men killed and wounded, including some officers.

On the eighteenth day of July the admiral, at the general's request, sent two ships of war, two armed sloops, and some transports, having troops on board, up the river; and they passed the city of Quebec without having met with any obstruction. The general being on board of this little armament, carefully surveyed the banks on the side of the enemy, which were extremely difficult, from from the nature of the ground; and these difficulties were further increased, by the foresight and precaution of the French commander. Though a descent seemed impracticable between the city and Cape Rouge, where it was intended, general Wolfe, with a view to divide the enemy's force, and obtain intelligence, ordered a detachment, under the command of colonel Carlton, to land higher up, at the Point au Tremble; to which place, he was informed, a good number of the inhabitants of Quebec had retired with their most valuable effects. This service was performed with little loss, and some prisoners were brought away; but no magazine was discovered.

The general, thus disappointed in his expectation, returned to Montmorenci, where brigadier Townshend had, by maintaining a superior fire across that river, prevented the enemy from erecting a battery, which would have commanded the English camp; and now he determined to attack them, notwithstanding their advantageous situation, and the incredible pains they had taken to render their camp absolutely impregnable. His design was, first, to reduce a detached redoubt close to the water's edge, seemingly situated within gunshot of the intrenchment on the hill. Should this fortification be defended by the enemy, he foresaw that he should be able to bring on a general engagement: on the contrary, should they remain tame spectators of its reduction, he could afterwards examine their situation at leisure, and fix upon the place at which they could be most easily attacked.

Dispositions were accordingly made for storming the redoubt. On the last day of July, in the forenoon, part of brigadier Monckton's brigade was embarked in the boats of the fleet, to be transported from the Point of Levi. The two brigades commanded by the brigadiers Townshend and Murray were drawn out, in order to cross the ford when it should be found necessary. To facilitate their passage, the admiral had stationed the Centurion ship of war in the channel, to check the fire of the lower battery, by which the ford was commanded: a numerous train of artillery was planted upon the eminence, to batter and enfilade the left of the enemy's intrenchment; and two flat-bottomed armed vessels, prepared for the purpose, were run aground near the redoubt, to favour the descent of the forces. The manifest confusion produced among the French by these previous steps, and by the fire of the Centurion, which was plied with great activity, determined Mr. Wolfe to storm this intrenchment without further delay. Orders were given, that the three brigadiers should put their troops in motion at a certain signal, which was accordingly made at a proper time of the tide.

Many of the boats from Point Levi ran aground upon a ledge that runs off a considerable distance from the shore; and this accident occasioned a disorder, by which so much time was lost, that the general was obliged to stop the march of brigadier Townshend's corps, which he observed to be in motion. In the mean time, the boats were floated and ranged in proper order, though exposed to a severe fire of shot and shells; and the general in person sounding the shore, pointed out the place where the troops might disembark with the least opposition. Thirteen companies of grenadiers, and two hundred men of the second American battalion, were the first who landed. They had received orders to form in four distinct bodies, and begin the attack, sustained by the corps of brigadier Monckton, as soon as the other troops should have crossed the ford, and be near enough to contribute their assistance. These instructions, however, were entirely neglected. Before Mr. Monckton had landed, and while brigadier Townshend was on his march at a considerable distance, the grenadiers, without waiting to be drawn up in any regular form, impetuously rushed towards the enemy's intrenchments in the utmost confusion. Their courage served only to increase their misfortune. They were received by such a violent and steady fire from the enemy, that, unable to stand the repeated volleys, they took shelter under the redoubt which the French had abandoned at their approach. In this uncomfortable situation they continued some time, incapable of forming under so hot a fire, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of many gallant officers, who lavishly exposed, and even lost their lives, in attempting to bring them into some kind of order.

The general, seeing all their endeavours ineffectual, ordered them to retreat and form behind Monckton's brigade, which was by this time landed, and drawn up on the beach. They accordingly retired in confusion, leaving a considerable number lying on the field, to the barbarity of the Indian savages, who butchered the living and scalped the dead, even in sight of their indignant companions. This unhappy accident occasioned a new delay, and the day was already far advanced. The wind began to blow with uncommon violence, and the tide to make; so that, in case of a second repulse, the retreat of brigadier Townshend might have been rendered hazardous and uncertain. Mr. Wolfe therefore thought proper to desist, and returned without further molestation to the other side of the river Montmorenci. The admiral ordered the two vessels which were aground to be set on fire, that they might not fall into the hands of the enemy. The circumstances that determined the general to make the attack on this side consisted in the following particulars: all the artillery could be used with good effect; all the troops could act at once; and, in case of a miscarriage, the retreat was secure and open, at least for a certain time of the tide. These advantages, however, seemed to have been counterbalanced by other considerations. The enemy were posted on a commanding eminence; the beach was covered with deep mud, slippery, and broken into holes and gullies; the hill was steep, and in some places inaccessible; the enemy were numerous, strongly intrenched, and defended by a formidable artillery. Had the attack succeeded, the loss of the English must have been very considerable in comparison of that of the enemy; because the neighbouring woods afforded these last immediate shelter; and the river St. Charles remained to be passed before the town could be regularly invested.

Immediately after this severe check, in which above five hundred men and many brave officers were killed, the general detached brigadier Murray with twelve hundred men in transports, above the town, to act in concert with rear-admiral Holmes, whom the admiral had sent up with some force against against the French shipping, which he hoped to destroy. The brigadier was likewise directed to seize every opportunity of fighting the enemy's detachments, and even of provoking them to battle. In pursuance of these instructions, he twice attempted to land on the north shore, but found it impracticable: the third attempt was more successful; he made a sudden descent at Chambaud, and burned a considerable magazine, filled with arms, cloathing, provision, and ammunition. The enemy's ships being moored in such a posture as to be out of the reach of all danger, and nothing else occurring that required the brigadier's longer stay, he returned to the camp, with intelligence procured from his prisoners, that the fort of Niagara was taken, Crown-Point abandoned, and general Amherst employed in making preparations to attack the corps posted at the isle aux Noix, under M. Burlemaque.

This information, however, though extremely agreeable, brought no prospect of the approach of any assistance from that quarter. The season wasted apace. The general fell violently ill; consumed by care, watching, and fatigue, too great to be supported by a delicate constitution, and by a body unequal to that vigorous and enterprising soul which it contained. It was not enough for him to escape from so great an expedition uncondemned and unapplauded: to be pitied was, he thought, but a milder kind of censure; and he knew that no military conduct can shine, unless it be gilded by success. His own high notions, the expectations of the public, the good success of other commanders, all turned inward upon him, and converted disappointment into disease. As soon as he had a little recovered, he dispatched an express with an account of his proceedings, to England, written indeed in the style of despondency, but with such perspicuity, clearness, and elegance, as would have ranked him among our best writers, if his military exploits had not placed him among our greatest commanders.

He resolved, when he sent away his account, to continue the campaign to the last possible moment; and, after a consultation with his officers, determined, that any further attempts at Montmorenci would be to little purpose; and that their principal operations ought to be carried on above the town, in order, if possible, to draw the enemy to an engagement. This resolution, however, was not adopted until the general and admiral had reconnoitred the town of Quebec, with a view to a general assault; and concluded from their own observation, reinforced by the opinion of the chief engineer, who was perfectly well acquainted with the interiors of the place, that such an attack could not be hazarded with any prospect of success. The ships of war indeed might have silenced the batteries of the lower town, but they could not affect the upper works, from which they must have sustained considerable damage.

When we consider the situation of this place, and the fortifications with which it was surrounded; the natural strength of the country; the great number of vessels and floating batteries they had provided for the defence of the river; the skill, valour, superior force, and uncommon vigilance of the enemy; their numerous bodies of savages continually hovering about the posts of the English, to surprise parties and harass detachments; we must own, that there was such a combination of difficulties as might have discouraged and perplexed the most resolute and intelligent commander.

In consequence of the resolution taken to quit the camp at Montmorenci, the troops and artillery were reembarked, and landed at Point Levi: they afterwards passed up the river in transports, while admiral Holmes made a movement with his ships, to amuse the enemy posted on the north shore: and the men being much crowded on board, the general ordered one half of them to be landed for refreshment on the other side of the river. As no possibility appeared of attacking the enemy above the town, the scheme of operations was entirely changed. The three brigadiers formed and presented a plan for conveying the troops farther down in boats, and landing them in the night within a league of Cape Diamond, in hope of ascending the Heights of Abraham, which rise abruptly with a steep ascent from the banks of the river, that they might take possession of the ground on the back of the city, where it was but indifferently fortified.

The dangers and difficulties attending the execution of this design were so peculiarly discouraging, that one would imagine it could not have been embraced but by a spirit of enterprize that bordered on despair. The stream was rapid, the shore shelving, the bank of the river lined with centinels, the landing-place so narrow as to be easily missed in the dark, and the ground so difficult as hardly to be surmounted in the day-time, had no opposition been expected. If the enemy had received the least intimation from spy or deserter, or even suspected the scheme; had the embarkation been disordered, in consequence of the darkness of the night, the rapidity of the river, or the shelviness of the north shore, near which they were obliged to row; had one centinel been alarmed, or the landing-place much mistaken; the Heights of Abraham must have been instantly secured, by such a force as would have rendered the undertaking abortive; confusion would have necessarily ensued in the dark; and this would have naturally produced a panic, which might have proved fatal to the greater part of the detachment. These objections could not escape the penetration of the gallant Wolfe, who nevertheless adopted the plan without hesitation, and even executed it in person, though at that time greatly enfeebled by the severe dysentery and fever with which he had lately been afflicted.

The necessary preparations being made, and the time fixed for this hazardous attempt, admiral Holmes moved with his squadron farther up the river, about three leagues above the place appointed for the disembarkation, that he might deceive the enemy and amuse M. de Bougainville, whom Montcalm had detached with fifteen hundred men to attend the motions of that squadron; but the English admiral was ordered to sail down the river in the night, so as to protect the landing of the forces; and these orders he punctually obeyed. On the twelfth day of September, an hour after midnight, the first embarkation, consisting of four complete regiments, the light infantry, commanded by colonel Howe, a detachment of Highlanders, and the American grenadiers, was made in flat-bottomed boats, under the immediate command of the the brigadiers Monckton and Murray; though general Wolfe accompanied them in person, and was among the first who landed, and they began to fall down with the tide to the intended place of disembarkation, rowing close to the north shore, in order to find it the more easily. Without any disorder the boats glided gently along; but, by the rapidity of the tide, and the darkness of the night, the boats overshot the mark, and the troops landed a little below the place at which the disembarkation was intended.

As the troops landed, the boats were sent back for the second embarkation, which was superintended by brigadier Townshend. In the mean time colonel Howe, with the light infantry and the Highlanders, ascended the woody precipices with admirable courage and activity; and dislodged a captain's guard, which defended a small intrenched narrow path, by which alone the rest of the forces could reach the summit. Then they mounted without farther molestation from the enemy, and the general drew them up in order as they arrived. Monsieur de Montcalm was no sooner informed that the English had gained the Heights of Abraham, which in a manner commanded the town on its weakest part, than he determined to hazard a battle, and began his march without delay, after having assembled his whole force from the side of Beauport.

General Wolfe observing the enemy crossing the river St. Charles, began to form his own line, which consisted of six battalions and the Louisbourg grenadiers; the right commanded by brigadier Monckton, and the left by brigadier Murray: to the rear of the left colonel Howe was posted with his light infantry, just returned from a four gun battery, which they had taken without opposition. M. de Montcalm advancing in such a manner as to shew his intention was to flank the left of the English, brigadier Townshend was sent thither with the regiment of Amherst, which he formed en potence, presenting a double front to the enemy: he was afterwards reinforced by two battalions; and the reserve consisted of one regiment drawn up in eight subdivisions, with large intervals. The right of the enemy was composed of half the colony troops, two battalions, and a body of Canadians and savages: their center consisted of a column, formed by two other regular battalions; and on the left one battalion, with the remainder of the colony troops, was posted: the bushes and corn-fields in their front were lined with fifteen hundred of their best marksmen, who kept up an irregular galling fire, which proved fatal to many brave officers, thus singled out for destruction.

This fire indeed was, in some measure, checked by the advanced posts of the British line, who piqueered with the enemy for some hours before the battle began. Both armies were destitute of artillery, except two small pieces on the side of the French, and a single gun, which the English seamen had made shift to draw up from the landing-place. This was very well served, and galled their column severely. At length, about nine in the morning, the enemy advanced to the charge with great order and resolution, though their fire was irregular and ineffectual. On the contrary, the British forces reserved their shot until the French had approached within forty yards of their line; then they poured in a terrible discharge, and continued the fire with such activity and spirit as could not fail to produce a very considerable effect. General Wolfe was stationed on the right, at the head of Bragg's regiment and the Louisbourg grenadiers, where the attack was most warm. As he stood conspicuous in the front of the line, he had been aimed at by the enemy's marksmen, and received a shot in the wrist, which however did not oblige him to quit the field. Having wrapped a handkerchief round his hand, he continued giving orders without the least emotion, and advanced at the head of the grenadiers, with their bayonets fixed, when another ball unfortunately pierced the breast of this young hero, who fell in the arms of victory, just as the enemy gave way; for at this very instant every separate regiment of the British army seemed to exert itself for the honour of its own peculiar character.

While the right pressed on with their bayonets, brigadier Murray briskly advanced with the troops under his command, and soon broke the center of the enemy; then the Highlanders drawing their broad swords, fell in among them with irresistible impetuosity, and drove them with great slaughter into the town and the works they had raised at the bridge of the river St. Charles. On the left and rear of the English the action was not so violent: some of the light infantry had thrown themselves into houses, where, being attacked, they defended themselves with great courage and resolution. Colonel Howe having taken post with two companies behind a small corps, sallied out frequently on the flanks of the enemy during this attack, and often drove them into heaps, while brigadier Townshend advanced platoons against their front; so that the right wing of the French were totally prevented from executing their first intention. The brigadier himself remained with Amherst's regiment to support this disposition, and to overawe a body of savages posted opposite to the light infantry, waiting for an opportunity to fall upon the rear of the British army.

General Wolfe being slain, and at the same time Mr. Monckton dangerously wounded at the head of Lascelles's regiment, where he distinguished himself with remarkable gallantry, the command devolved to brigadier Townshend, who hastened to the centre; and finding the troops disordered in the pursuit, formed them again with uncommon expedition. This necessary task was scarce performed when M. de Bougainville, with a body of two thousand fresh men, appeared in the rear of the English. He had begun his march from Cape Rouge, as soon as he received intelligence that the British troops had gained the Heights of Abraham; but did not come up in time to have any share in the battle. Mr. Townshend immediately ordered two battalions, with two pieces of artillery, to advance against this officer, who retired at their approach among woods and swamps, where general Townshend was too wise to hazard a precarious attack. He had already gained a complete victory, taken a great number of French officers, and was posted in a very advantageous situation, which it would have been imprudent to forego.

The French general M. de Montcalm was mortally wounded in the battle, and conveyed into Quebec, from whence, before he died, he wrote a letter to general Townshend, recommending the prisoners to that generous humanity by which the British nation has been always distinguished. His second in command was left wounded on the field, and next day expired on board an English ship, to which he had been carried. About one thousand of the enemy were made prisoners, including a great number of officers; and about five hundred were slain on the field of battle. The wreck of their army, after they had reinforced the garrison of Quebec, retired to Port au Tremble, from whence they proceeded to Jaques Quartiers, where they remained intrenched, until they were compelled by the severity of the weather to make the best of their way to Trois Rivières and Montreal.

This important victory was obtained at the expence of fifty-six men killed, including nine officers, and of five hundred and six men wounded; but the death of general Wolfe was a national loss, universally lamented. This gentleman was formed by nature for military greatness; his memory was retentive, his judgment sound, and his comprehension amazingly quick and clear: his constitutional courage was not only uniform and daring, perhaps in the extreme, but he possessed that higher species of it, if I may be allowed the expression, that strength, steadiness, and activity of mind, which no difficulties could obstruct, nor dangers deter. With an unusual liveliness, almost to impetuosity of temper, he was not subject to passion; with the greatest independence of spirit, free from pride: generous, almost to profusion, he contemned every little art for the acquisition of wealth, whilst he searched after objects for his charity and beneficence: the deserving soldier never went unrewarded; and even the needy inferior officer frequently tasted of his bounty. Constant and distinguishing in his attachments; manly and unreserved; yet gentle, kind, and conciliating in his manners: he enjoyed a long share of the friendship, and almost the universal good-will of mankind; and to crown all, sincerity and candour, a true sense of honour, justice, and public liberty, seemed the inherent principles of his nature, and the uniform rule of his conduct.

He betook himself, when very young, to the profession of arms; and with such talents, joined to the most unwearied assiduity, no wonder that he was so soon singled out as a most rising military genius. Even so early as the battle of La Feldt, when scarce twenty years of age, he exerted himself in so masterly a manner, and at a very critical juncture, that it drew the highest encomiums from the great officer then at the head of our army. During the whole of that war he went on forming the military character; was present at every engagement, and never passed undistinguished. Even after the peace, whilst others lolled on pleasure's downy lap, he was cultivating the arts of war. He introduced, without one act of severity, such regularity and exactness of discipline in his corps, that as long as the six British battalions on the Plains of Minden are recorded in the annals of Europe, so long will Kingsley's stand amongst the foremost of that day. Of that regiment he continued lieutenant-colonel, till the great minister, who roused the sleeping genius of his country, called him forth into higher spheres of action. He was early in the most secret consultations for the attack of Rochefort; and what he would have done there, and what he afterwards did at Louisbourg, are fresh in every one's memory.

He was scarce returned from thence when he was appointed to command the important expedition against Quebec. There his abilities shone forth in their brightest lustre: in spite of many unforeseen difficulties, from the nature of the ground, from the great superiority of the enemy, the strength of the place itself, and his own bad state of health, he persevered with unwearied diligence, practising every stratagem of war to effect his purpose: at last, in conjunction with his subordinates in command, he formed and executed that great, that dangerous, yet necessary plan, which drew out the French to their defeat, and will for ever denominate him the conqueror of Canada. But there—tears will flow—there, when within the grasp of victory, he received a wound, first in his wrist, and then in his breast, which obliged him to be carried off to a small distance, in the rear, where roused from fainting in the last agonies, by the sound of they run, he eagerly asked, “Who run?” and being told, the French, and that they were defeated, he said, “Then I thank God; I die contented;” and almost instantly expired.

Immediately after the battle of Quebec, admiral Saunders, who, together with his subordinates Durell and Holmes, had all along co-operated heartily with the land forces for the advantage of the service, sent up all the boats of the fleet, with artillery and ammunition; and on the seventeenth day of the month sailed up, with all the ships of war, in a disposition to attack the lower town, while the upper part should be assaulted by general Townshend. This gentleman had employed the time from the day of action in fortifying the camp with redoubts, in forming a military road for the cannon, in drawing up the artillery, preparing batteries, and cutting off the enemy's communication with the country. On the seventeenth, before any battery could be erected, a flag of truce was sent from the town with proposals of capitulation; which, being maturely considered by the general and admiral, were accepted and signed at eight next morning.

They granted the more favourable terms, as the enemy continued to assemble in the rear of the British army; as the season was become wet, stormy, and cold; threatening the troops with sickness, and the fleet with accident; and as a considerable advantage would accrue from taking possession of the town while the walls were in a state of defence. What rendered the capitulation still more fortunate for the British general was, the information he afterwards received from deserters, importing, that the enemy had rallied, and were reinforced behind Cape Rouge, under the command of M. de Levy, arrived from Montreal for that purpose, with two regular battalions; and that M. de Bougainville, at the head of eight hundred men, with a convoy of provisions, was actually on his march to throw himself into the town on the eighteenth, that very morning on which it was surrendered: for the place was not then completely invested, as the enemy had broke their bridge of boats, and posted detachments in very strong strong works, on the other side of the river St. Charles.

The capitulation was no sooner signed than the British forces took possession of Quebec on the land side, and guards were posted in different parts of the town, to preserve order and discipline: at the same time captain Palliser, with a body of seamen, entered the lower town and took the same precautions. Next day about a thousand prisoners were embarked on board of transports, which set sail for France with the first opportunity: in the mean time, the inhabitants of the country came in great numbers, to deliver up their arms, and take the oath of fidelity to the English government. The death of Montcalm, which indeed was an irreparable loss to France, in all probability overwhelmed the enemy with consternation, and confounded all their councils; otherwise we cannot account for the tame surrender of Quebec to a handful of troops, even after the victory they had obtained: for although the place was not regularly fortified on the land side, and most of the houses were in ruins, their walls and parapets had not yet sustained the least damage: the besiegers were hardly sufficient to complete the investiture: a fresh army was assembled in the neighbourhood, with which their communication continued open; the season was so far advanced, that the British troops in a little time must have been forced to desert, by the severity of the weather, and even retire with their fleet before the approach of winter, which never fails to freeze up the river St. Laurence.

When the news of this decisive action arrived in England, we all remember, though it is very difficult to describe, the various and mixed emotions with which every one was affected. But two days before this came, was received the express which general Wolfe had sent off after the miscarriage at Montmorenci. When the general doubted, the public thought they had reason to despair. But whilst this gloom was fresh, and in the midst of the general despondency, a second express arrived, and brought, all at once, an account of the victory, the taking of Quebec, and the death of general Wolfe. The effect of such joyful news, immediately on the back of such a dejection, and then the mixture of grief and pity which attended the public congratulations and applauses, was very singular and affecting. The sort of mourning triumph which manifested itself on that occasion, did equal honour to the memory of the general and to the humanity of the nation. The king expressed his satisfaction, by conferring the honour of knighthood upon captain Douglas, whose ship brought the first tidings of this success; and gratified him and colonel Hale with considerable presents. A day of solemn thanksgiving was appointed by proclamation through all the dominions of Great Britain. The city of London, the universities, and many other corporations of the kingdom, presented congratulatory addresses to his majesty. The parliament was no sooner assembled than the secretary of state, in the house of commons, with that energy of eloquence peculiar to himself, expatiated upon the successes of the campaign, the transcendent merit of the deceased general, and the conduct and courage of the admirals and officers who assisted in the conquest of Quebec. In consequence of this harangue, and the motion by which it was succeeded, the house unanimously resolved to present an address, desiring his majesty would order a monument to be erected in Westminster-abbey, to the memory of major-general Wolfe. At the same time they passed another resolution, that the thanks of the house should be given to the surviving generals and admirals employed in the glorious and successful expedition to Quebec. Testimonies of this kind, while they reflect the greatest honour on those who receive them, serve at the same time to excite the ambition of other commanders to merit the like distinction.

The people of England were so elevated by the astonishing success of this campaign, which was also prosperous on the continent of Europe, that, far from expressing the least uneasiness at the heavy burthens they were obliged to bear, they, with a spirit peculiar to the British nation, voluntarily raised large contributions to purchase warm jackets, stockings, shoes, coats, and blankets, for the soldiers who were exposed to the rigours of an inclement sky, in Germany and America. But they displayed a more noble proof of universal benevolence, extended even to foes. The French ministry, straitened in their finances, which were found scarce sufficient to support the war, had sacrificed their duty to their king, and every sentiment of compassion for his unhappy subjects, to a thirst of vengeance, and sanguinary views of ambition. They had withdrawn the usual allowance from their subjects who were detained prisoners in England; and these wretched captives, amounting in number to near twenty thousand, were left to the mercy of those enemies whom their sovereign had taken such pains to exasperate. The allowance which they received from the British government effectually secured them from the horrors of famine: but still they remained destitute of other conveniencies, and particularly exposed to the miseries of cold and nakedness. The generous English beheld these forlorn captives with sentiments of sympathy and compassion: they considered them as their fellow-creatures and brethren in humanity, and forgot their country while they beheld their distress. A considerable subscription was raised in their behalf, and in a few weeks they were completely clothed by the charity of the British benefactors. This act of beneficence was certainly one of the noblest triumphs of the human mind, which even the most inveterate enemies of Great Britain cannot help regarding with reverence and admiration.

The city of Quebec being reduced, together with great part of the adjacent country, brigadier Townshend, who had accepted his commission with the express proviso that he should return to England at the end of the campaign, furnished it with a garrison of five thousand effective men, victualled from the fleet, under the command of brigadier Murray; and embarking with admiral Saunders, arrived in Great Britain about the beginning of winter. As for brigadier Monckton, he was conveyed to New York, where he happily recovered of his wound.

Nor were the arms of Great Britain less successful in the East than in the West Indies. We have already observed that general Lally had formed a resolution to undertake the siege of Madras, and made made mighty preparations for that purpose. In the month of October he had marched into Arcot without opposition, and in the beginning of December he proceeded towards Madras. On the twelfth he marched over Choultry Plain in three divisions, cannonaded by the English artillery with considerable effect, and took post at Egmore and St. Thome. Colonel Laurence, who commanded the garrison of Madras, retired to the island, in order to prevent the enemy from taking possession of the island bridge; and at the same time ordered the posts to be secured in the back town, or suburbs of Madras.

In the morning of the fourteenth, the enemy advancing with their whole force to attack this place, the English detachments withdrew into the garrison; and in less than an hour a grand sally was made, under the command of colonel Draper, a gallant officer, who distinguished himself remarkably on this occasion. He fell upon the regiment of Lorraine with great impetuosity; and, in all probability, would have cut them to pieces, had not they been supported by the arrival of a fresh brigade. After an obstinate dispute, in which many officers, and a good number of men were slain on both sides, colonel Draper was obliged to retreat, not altogether satisfied with the conduct of his grenadiers. As the garrison of Madras was not very numerous, nothing further was attempted on their side without the works. In the mean time the enemy proceeded, with great expedition, to erect their batteries against the fort and town; which being opened on the sixth day of January, maintained a continued discharge of shot and shells for twenty days, advancing their trenches all the time under cover of this fire, until they reached the breast of the glacis. There they erected a battery of four pieces of cannon, and opened it on the last day of the month; but for five days successively, they were obliged to close their embrasures by the superior fire of the fort, and at length to abandon it intirely: nevertheless, they still maintained a severe fire from the first grand battery, which was placed at the distance of four hundred and fifty yards from the defences. This artillery was so well served, as to disable twenty-six pieces of cannon, three mortars, and effect an inconsiderable breach. Perhaps they might have had more success, had they battered in breach from the beginning; but Mr. Lally, in order to intimidate the inhabitants, had cruelly bombarded the town, and demolished the houses: he was, however, happily disappointed in his expectation, by the wise and resolute precautions of governor Pigot; by the vigilance, conduct, and bravery of the colonels Laurence and Draper, seconded by the valour and activity of Major Brereton, and the spirit of the inferior officers.

The artillery of the garrison was so well directed, that, from the fifth day of February, the fire of the enemy gradually decreased from twenty-three to six pieces of cannon: nevertheless, they advanced their sap along the sea-side, so as to undermine the north-east angle of the covered way, from whence their musquetry drove the besieged. They likewise endeavoured to open a passage into the ditch by a mine; but sprung it so injudiciously, that they could make no advantage of it, as it lay exposed to the fire of several cannon. While these operations were carried on before the town, Major Gaillaud with a body of sipoys, some of the country horse, and a few Europeans, drawn from the English garrisons of Tiruchenappaly and Chingliput, hovered at the distance of a few miles; blocking up the roads in such a manner, that the enemy were obliged, four several times, to send large detachments against him, in order to open the communication; by which means the progress of the siege was in a great measure retarded.

On the sixteenth day of February in the evening, the Queenborough ship of war, commanded by captain Kempenfelt, and the company's ship the Revenge, arrived in the road of Madras, with a reinforcement of six hundred men, belonging to colonel Draper's regiment: and part of them was immediately disembarked. From the beginning of the siege, the enemy had discovered a backwardness in the service, which seemed to promise them but little success. They were ill supplied by their commissaries and contractors: they were disheartened by the obstinate defence of the garrison; and all their hopes were intirely extinguished by the arrival of this reinforcement. After a brisk fire, they raised the siege that very night, leaving behind them forty pieces of cannon; and, having destroyed the powder mills at Ogmore, withdrew into the territory of Arcot.

The English forces in the East-Indies, being as yet too weak to make head against Lally in the field, little detached expeditions were planned and executed with equal spirit and sagacity. Colonel Ford, who commanded the troops in Bengal, attacked and defeated the French commander Conflans, in the neighbourhood of Masulipatam, which he afterwards entered in triumph. At the same time captain Richard Maitland set out from Bombay, with fifteen hundred sipoys, and nine hundred Europeans, on an expedition against the sipoys who occupied the town and castle of Surat.

In the month of February, he embarked with his troops on board of the company's armed vessels, and in a few days arrived at a place called Dentioury, about nine miles from Surat; and here he quartered his troops for refreshment: in two days he advanced against the French garden, in which a considerable number of the enemy was posted, and drove them from thence after a very obstinate dispute.

Then he erected a battery, from which he battered the wall in breach: but this method appearing dilatory, he called a council of war composed of the land and sea-officers, and laid before them the plan of a general attack, which was accordingly executed next morning. The company's grab, and the bomb-ketches, being warped up the river in the night, were disposed in a line of battle opposite to the Bundar, which was the strongest fortification that the enemy possessed; and under the fire of these, the troops being landed, took the Bundar by assault. The outer town being thus reduced, he forthwith began to bombard the inner town and castle with such fury, that next morning they both surrendered, on condition that the inhabitants should march out with their effects; and captain Maitland took possession without further dispute. This conquest, which cost about two hundred men, including a few officers, was atchieved with such expedition, that he returned to Bombay by the ninth day of April.

The main body of the English forces, which had been posted at Madras, for the security of that important settlement, took the field after the siege was raised, and possessed themselves of Conjiveram, a place of great consequence, which, with the fort of Schengelpel, commanded all the adjacent country, and covered the British possessions to the northward. Mr. Lally, sensible of the importance of this post, took the same route, in order to dislodge them; but finding all his attempts ineffectual, he withdrew towards Wandewash, where his troops were put into quarters of cantonment. Nothing else of moment was performed till the month of September, when major Brereton, who commanded the English forces, being joined by major Gordon with three hundred men of colonel Coote's battalion, resolved to attack the enemy in his turn. On the fourteenth day of the month he began his march from Conjiveram for Wandewash, at the head of four hundred Europeans, seven thousand sipoys, seventy European, and three hundred black horse, with fourteen pieces of artillery. During his route he invested and took the fort of Trivitar, from whence he advanced to the village of Wandewash, where the French, to the number of one thousand, were strongly encamped under the guns of a fort commanded by a Raja, mounting twenty cannon, under the direction of a French gunner. On the thirtieth day of September the English, at two in the morning, attacked the village in three different places, and drove them from it, after a very obstinate dispute; but this advantage they were not able to maintain. The black pioneers ran away during the attack, so that proper traverses could not be made in the streets; and at day-break the fort poured in upon them a prodigious discharge of grape-shot with considerable effect. The enemy had retired to a dry ditch, which served as an intrenchment, from whence they made furious sallies; and a body of three hundred European horse were already in motion, to fall upon their rear and complete their confusion. In this emergency they retired in disorder, and might have been entirely ruined, had not the body of reserve effectually covered their retreat; yet this could not be effected without the loss of several officers, and above three hundred men killed and wounded. After this mortifying check, they encamped a few days in sight of the fort, and the rainy season setting in, returned to Conjiveram. The garrison of Wandewash was afterwards reinforced by French and sipoys, and the other troops of the enemy were assembled by brigadier general de Buffly at Arcot.

During these transactions at land, the superiority at sea was still disputed between the English and French admirals. On the first day of September vice-admiral Pocock sailed from Madras to the southward, in quest of the enemy, and next day discovered the French fleet, consisting of fifteen sail, standing to the northward. He forthwith threw out the signal for a general chase, and stood towards them with all the sail he could carry; but the wind abating, he could not approach near enough to engage. During the three succeeding days he exerted his utmost endeavours to bring them to a battle, which they still declined; and at last they disappeared. He then bent his course towards Pondicherry, on the supposition that they were bound to that harbour, and on the eighth day of the month observed them standing to the southward; but he could not bring them to an engagement till the tenth, when M. d'Apche, about two in the afternoon, made the signal for battle, and the cannonading began without further delay. The British squadron consisted only of nine ships of the line; the enemy's fleet amounted to eleven; but they had still a greater advantage in number of men and weight of metal. Both squadrons fought with incredible obstinacy till about ten minutes after four, when the enemy's rear began to give way; this example was soon followed by their center: and finally the van, with the whole squadron, bore away to the south south-east with all the canvas they could spread. The British squadron had suffered so much in their masts and rigging that they could not pursue; so that M. d'Apche was allowed to retreat without molestation.

On the fifteenth admiral Pocock returned to Madras, where his squadron being refitted by the twenty-sixth, he sailed again to Pondicherry, and in the road saw the enemy lying at anchor in line of battle. The wind being off shore, he made the line of battle a-head, and for some time continued in this situation. At length the French admiral weighed anchor, and came forth; but instead of bearing down upon the English squadron, which had fallen to leeward, he kept close to the wind, and stretched away to the southward. Admiral Pocock finding him averse to another engagement, and his own squadron being in no condition to pursue, he, with the advice of his captains, desisted, and returned once more to the harbour of Madras. On the side of the English above three hundred men were killed in the engagement, including captain Michie, who commanded the Newcastle, captain Gore of the marines, two lieutenants, a master, gunner, and boatswain; the captains Somerset and Brereton, with about two hundred and fifty men, were wounded, and many of the ships considerably damaged. The loss of the enemy was, in all probability, much more considerable, inasmuch as, notwithstanding their great superiority in number of ships, weight of metal, and complements of men, they made their best of their way to the island of Mauritius, in order to be refitted, having on board general Lally and some other officers. Thus they left the English masters of the Indian coast; a superiority still more confirmed by the arrival of rear-admiral Cornish, with four ships of the line, who had set sail from England in the beginning of the year, and joined admiral Pocock at Madras on the eighteenth day of October.

The Dutch had, during the course of the present war, maintained a most pusillanimous, and, in some respects, a most insidious neutrality; and they now proceeded in the East Indies to open acts of hostility. The great extension of the English trade in the kingdom of Bengal had excited the envy and jealousy of the Dutch factory, who possessed a strong fort at Chinchura, in the river of Bengal, and determined, if possible, to engross to themselves the whole saltpetre branch of commerce. They had, without doubt, tampered with the new Nabob, who lay under such obligations to the English, English, and probably secured his connivance. Their scheme was approved by the governor of Batavia, who undertook to put it in execution; and for that purpose chose the opportunity when the British squadron had retired to the coast of Malabar. On pretence of reinforcing the Dutch garisons in Bengal, he equipped an armament of seven ships, having on board five hundred European troops and six hundred Malayese, under the command of colonel Ruffel. This armament having touched at Negapatam, proceeded up the bay, and arrived in the river of Bengal about the beginning of October.

Colonel Clive, who then resided at Calcutta, had received intimation of their design, which he was determined at all events to defeat. He complained to the Subah, who, upon such application, could not decently refuse an order to the director and council of Hughley, forbidding this armament to proceed up the river. The colonel at the same time sent a letter to the Dutch commodore, importing, that as he had received information of their design, he could not permit them to land forces and march to Chinchura. In answer to this intimation, the Dutch commodore, whose whole fleet had not yet arrived, assured the English commander that he had no intention to send any forces to Chinchura, and begged liberty to land some of his troops for refreshment; a favour which was granted, on condition that they should not advance.

Notwithstanding the Subah's order, and his own engagement to this effect, the rest of the ships were no sooner arrived than he proceeded up the river to the neighbourhood of Tannah fort, where his troops were landed, and began their march to Chinchura. In the mean time, by way of revenging the affront he pretended to have received, in being denied a passage to their own factory, he took several small vessels on the river belonging to the English company; and the Calcutta Indiaman, commanded by captain Wilson, homeward-bound, sailing down the river, the Dutchman sent word to him, that if he attempted to pass he would sink him to the bottom. The English captain seeing them run out their guns as if they really intended to put their threats in execution, returned to Calcutta, where two other ships lay at anchor, and reported his adventure to colonel Clive, who forthwith ordered the three ships to prepare for battle, and attack the Dutch armament.

The ships being properly manned, and their quarters lined with saltpetre, they fell down the river, and found the Dutch squadron drawn up in line of battle, in order to oppose their passage, which it must be acknowledged they seemed able to effect; for three of them were mounted with thirty-six guns each, three of them with twenty-six, and the seventh carried sixteen. The Duke of Dorset, commanded by captain Forrester, being the first that approached them, dropped anchor close to their line, and began the engagement with a broadside, which was immediately returned. A dead calm unfortunately ensuing, this single ship was for a considerable time exposed to the whole fire of the enemy; but a small breeze springing up, the Calcutta and the Hardwicke advanced to her assistance, and a severe fire was maintained on both sides, till two of the Dutch ships slipping their cables, bore away, and a third was driven ashore. Their commodore being thus weakened, after a few broadsides, struck his flag to captain Wilson, and the other three followed his example. The victory being thus obtained, without the loss of one man on the side of the English, captain Wilson took possession of the prizes, the decks of which were strewed with carnage, and sent the prisoners to colonel Clive at Calcutta.

The detachment of troops which they had landed, to the number of eleven hundred men, met with a check no less mortifying. Colonel Clive being informed that they were in full march to Chinchura, detached colonel Forde with five hundred men from Calcutta, in order to oppose and put a stop to their march at the French gardens. He accordingly proceeded to the northward, and entered the town of Chandernagore, where he was suddenly attacked by a Dutch party sent out from Chinchura to join and conduct the expected reinforcement. These being routed and dispersed, after a short engagement, colonel Forde in the morning advanced to a plain in the neighbourhood of Chinchura, where he found the enemy prepared to give him battle, on the twenty-fifth day of November. They even began the action with great spirit and activity; but found the fire of the English artillery and battalion so intolerably hot, that they soon gave way, and were totally defeated. A considerable number were slain, and the greater part of those who survived the battle were taken prisoners. During this contest the Nabob, at the head of a considerable army, maintained a suspicious neutrality; and in all likelihood would have joined with the Dutch, had they proved victorious, as he had reason to believe they would, from their great superiority in number. But fortune no sooner declared in favour of the English, than he made a tender of his service to the victor, and even offered to subdue Chinchura with his own army.

In the mean time, proposals of accommodation being made to him by the directors and council of the Dutch factory at Chinchura, a negociation was set on foot, and a treaty concluded, to the satisfaction of all parties. Above three hundred of the prisoners enlisted into the service of Great Britain; the rest embarked on board the ships, which were restored as soon as the peace was ratified, and immediately departed for the settlement of Batavia.

The English company were still more successful on the coast of Coromandel. The governor and council of Madras having received intelligence that the French general, Lally, had detached a strong body of troops to the southward, advanced to Syringham, and menaced Tiruchenapally with a siege, it was determined that colonel Coote, who had lately arrived from England, should take the field, and endeavour to stop his progress. He accordingly began his march at the head of two thousand one hundred Europeans, including cavalry, and three thousand blacks, with fourteen pieces of cannon and one howitzer. On the twenty-seventh day of November he laid siege to the fort of Wandewash: having made a practicable breach, the garrison, amounting to near nine hundred men, surrendered themselves prisoners of war; and here he found forty-nine pieces of cannon, with a great quantity of ammunition. Then he invested the fortress of Carangoly, a place commanded by colonel O'Konnely, at the head of one hundred Europeans and five hundred sipoys. In a few days he dismounted the greater part of their guns, and they submitted, on condition that the Europeans should be allowed to march out with the honours of war; but the sipoys were disarmed and dismissed.

General Lally, alarmed at the progress of this brave, vigilant, and enterprising officer, collected all his forces at Arcot, to the number of two thousand two hundred Europeans, including horse, three hundred Cofferies, and ten thousand black troops or sipoys, with twenty-five pieces of cannon. Of these he assumed the command in person, and on the tenth of January began his march in order to recover Wandewash. Colonel Coote having received information on the twelfth that he had taken Conjiveram, endeavoured by a forced march to regain this place, which they accordingly abandoned at his approach, and prosecuting their route to Wandewash, invested the fort without delay. The English commander passed the river Palla, in order to march towards the same quarter; and, on the twenty-first day of the month, understanding that a breach was already made, determined to give them battle without further hesitation.

The cavalry being formed, and sustained by five companies of sipoys, he advanced against the enemy's horse, which, being at the same time galled by two pieces of cannon, retired in disorder. Then colonel Coote, having taken possession of a tank which they had abandoned, returned to the line, which was by this time drawn up in order of battle. Observing the men in high spirits, and eager to engage, he ordered the whole army to advance; and by nine in the morning they were within two miles of the enemy's camp, where they halted about half an hour. During this interval, the colonel examined the situation of the French forces, who were very advantageously posted, and made a movement to the right, which constrained them to alter their disposition. They now advanced, in their turn, within three quarters of a mile of the English line; and the cannonading began with great fury on both sides. About noon their European cavalry coming up with a resolute air to attack the left of the English, colonel Coote brought up some companies of sipoys and two pieces of cannon, to support the horse which were ordered to oppose them; and these advancing, fell upon their flank with such fury that they broke, and were driven by the English cavalry above a mile from the left, upon the rear of their own army.

Mean while, both lines continued advancing towards each other, and about one o'clock the firing with small arms began with great vivacity. One of the French tumbrils being blown up by an accidental shot, the English commander took immediate advantage of their confusion. He ordered major Brereton to wheel Draper's regiment to the left, and suddenly to charge the enemy in flank. This service was performed with such resolution and success, that the left wing of the French was completely routed, and fell upon their center, now closely engaged with the left of the English. About two in the afternoon their whole line gave way, and fled towards their own camp, which, observing themselves closely pursued, they precipitately abandoned, together with twenty-two pieces of cannon. In this engagement they lost about eight hundred men, killed and wounded, besides about fifty prisoners, including brigadier-general de Buffy, the chevalier Godeville, quarter-master-general, lieutenant-colonel Murphy, three captains, five lieutenants, and some other officers. On the side of the English, two hundred and sixty-two were killed and wounded, and among the former the brave and accomplished major Brereton, whose death was universally lamented.

General Lally having retreated with his broken troops to Pondicherry, the baron de Vasserot was detached towards the same place with a thousand horse and three hundred sipoys, to ravage and lay waste the French territory. In the mean time, the indefatigable colonel Coote undertook the siege of Chilliput, which in two days was surrendered by the chevalier de Tilly, himself and his garrison remaining prisoners of war. The same too was the fate of fort Timmery, which being reduced, the colonel continued his march to Arcot, the capital of the province, against the fort of which he opened his batteries on the fifth of February. When he had carried on his approaches within sixty yards of the crest of the glacis, the garrison, consisting of two hundred and fifty Europeans, and near three hundred sipoys, surrendered as prisoners of war; and here the English commander found twenty-two pieces of cannon, four mortars, and a great quantity of all kind of military stores. Thus the campaign was gloriously finished with the conquest of Arcot, after the French army had been routed and ruined by the diligence of colonel Coote, whose courage, conduct, and activity, cannot be sufficiently admired. The reader will observe that, rather than interrupt the thread of such an interesting narration, I have ventured to encroach upon the annals of the year 1760.

Having thus given a particular detail of all the remarkable transactions that distinguished this year in Europe, Africa, America, and Asia, I shall now proceed, as usual, to close it with taking notice of some domestic events; which, though not very important in themselves, may nevertheless merit a place in a general history. In the beginning of the year the court of London received the melancholy news of the death of the princess-dowager of Orange and Nassau, governess of the United Provinces, in the fiftieth year of her age, and during the minority of her son the present stadtholder. Feeling her end approaching, she delivered a key to one of her attendants, directing him to fetch two papers, which she signed with her own hand. One was a contract of marriage between her daughter and the prince of Nassau Weilburg: the other was a letter to the States-general, beseeching them to consent to this marriage, and preserve inviolate the regulations she had made touching the education and tutelage of the young stadtholder. These two papers being signed and sealed, she sent for her children, exhorted them to make a proper improvement of the education they had received, and to live in harmony with each other. Then she implored heaven to shower down its blessings on them both, and embraced them with the most affecting marks of maternal tenderness. She afterwards continued to converse converse calmly and deliberately with her friends, and in a few hours expired.

She was the eldest daughter of his Britannic majesty, possessed of many personal accomplishments and exemplary virtues; pious, moderate, sensible, and circumspect. She had exercised her authority with equal sagacity and resolution; respected even by those who were no friends to the house of Orange; and died with great fortitude and resignation. In her will she appointed the king her father, and the princess-dowager of Orange her mother-in-law, honorary tutors, and prince Louis of Brunswic acting tutor to her children.

In the morning after her decease, the States-general and the states of Holland were extraordinarily assembled; and having received notice of this event, proceeded to confirm the regulations which had been made for the minority of the stadtholder. Prince Louis of Brunswic was invited to assist in the assembly of Holland, where he took the oaths as representing the captain-general of the union. Then he communicated to the assembly the act by which the princess had appointed him guardian of her children. He was afterwards invited to the assembly of the States-general, who agreed to the resolution of Holland with respect to his guardianship; and in the evening the different colleges of the government sent formal deputations to the young stadtholder and the princess Caroline his sister, in whose names and presence they were received, and answered by their guardian and representative. A formal intimation of the death of the princess was transmitted to the king her father, in a pathetic letter, by the States-general, deploring the loss which he, as well as they, had suffered by this melancholy event; and assuring him they would employ all their care and attention in securing and defending the rights and interests of the young stadtholder and the princess his sister, whom they considered as the children of the republic. The royal family of England sustained another heavy stroke in the course of this year, by the decease of the princess Elizabeth-Caroline, second daughter of his late royal highness Frederic prince of Wales, a lady of the most engaging manners, who died at Kew in the month of September, before she had attained the nineteenth year of her age.

Whether the sanguinary spirit, which never fails to accompany a long and vigorous war, unhappily contributed at this period to render the temper of the English more savage than usual, or whether other causes less visible might not co-operate in producing this effect; certain it is, the present year was distinguished by some murders remarkable for instances of the most shocking barbarity. One Halsey, who commanded a merchant ship in the voyage from Jamaica to England, having conceived some personal dislike to a poor sailor, named Davidson, insulted him with such abuse, exposed him to such hardships, and punished him with such wantonness of cruelty, that the poor wretch leaped overboard in despair. His inhuman tyrant envying him that death, which would have rescued a miserable object from his brutality, plunged into the sea after him, and brought him on board, declaring he should not escape while there were any torments left to inflict. Accordingly, he exercised his tyranny upon him with redoubled rigour, tied him to the shrouds with a cord, and beat him for some time with such violence, that in a few hours after the poor creature expired. This savage ruffian was likewise indicted for the murder of another mariner, called Edwards; but being convicted on the first trial, the second was found unnecessary, and the criminal suffered death according to the law, which is perhaps too mild for malefactors convicted of such aggravated cruelty.

Another barbarous murder was committed in the country near Birmingham, upon a sheriff's officer, by the sons of one Darby, whose effects the bailiff had seized on a distress for rent. The two young assassins, encouraged by the father, attacked the unhappy wretch with clubs, and mangled him in a terrible manner, so that he hardly retained any signs of life. Not contented with this cruel execution, they stripped him naked, and dragging him out of the house, scourged him with a waggoner's whip, until the flesh was cut from his bones. In this miserable condition he was found weltering in his blood, and conveyed to a neighbouring house, where he immediately expired. The three barbarians were apprehended, after having made a desperate resistance. They were tried, convicted, and executed: the sons were hung in chains, and the body of the father dissected.

One Mrs. Walker, the widow of a timber-merchant at Rotherhithe, being cruelly murdered in her own house, Mary Edmonson, a young woman her niece, ran out into the street with her arms cut across, and gave the alarm, declaring her aunt had been assassinated by four men, who forced their way into the house, and that she (the niece) had received those wounds in attempting to defend her relation. According to the circumstances that appeared, this unnatural wretch had cut the throat of her aunt and benefactress with a case-knife, then dragged the body from the wash-house to the parlour; that she had stole a watch and some silver spoons, and concealed them, together with the knife and her own apron, which was soaked with the blood of the deceased.

After having acted this shocking tragedy, at the bare recital of which the humane reader must shudder with horror, she put on another apron, and wounded her own flesh, the better to conceal her guilt. Notwithstanding these precautions she was suspected, and committed to prison. Being brought to trial, she was convicted and condemned upon circumstantial evidence, and finally executed at Kennington Common, though she denied the fact to the last moment of her life. At the place of execution she behaved with great composure, and, after having spent some minutes in devotion, protested she was innocent of the crime laid to her charge.

What seemed to corroborate this protestation, was the condition and character of this young woman, who had been educated in a sphere above the vulgar, and maintained a reputation without reproach in the country, where she was actually betrothed to a clergyman. On the other hand, the circumstances that appeared against her almost amounted to a certainty; though nothing weaker than proof positive ought to determine a jury in capital cases to give a verdict against the person accused.

A miscreant, whose name was Haines, having espoused the daughter of a farmer in the neighbourhood of Gloucester, who possessed an estate of eighty pounds a year, which he intended to divide among seven children, was so abandoned as to form the design of poisoning the whole family, that, in right of his wife, he might enjoy the whole inheritance. For the execution of this infernal scheme, he employed his own father to procure him a quantity of arsenic; part of which he administered to three of the children, who were immediately seized with the dreadful symptoms produced by this mineral, and the eldest expired. He afterwards mixed it with three apple-cakes which he bought for the purpose, and presented to the other three children, who underwent the same terrible convulsions which had proved fatal to the eldest brother. The instantaneous effects of the poison occasioned a suspicion of Haines, who being seized and examined, the whole scene of villany was disclosed. Nevertheless, the villain found means to escape.

In the month of April five French prisoners, confined on board the king's ship the Royal Oak, were convicted of having murdered one Jean de Manaux, their countryman and fellow-prisoner, in revenge for his having discovered that they had forged passes to facilitate their escape. Enraged at this detection, they seized this unfortunate informer in the place of their confinement, gagged his mouth, stripped him naked, tied him with a strong cord to a ring-bolt, and scourged his body with such savage cruelty, as almost put an end to his life. By dint of struggling the poor wretch disengaged himself from the cord with which he had been tied; and being unable to stand, fell upon his back; then they finished the tragedy, by leaping and stamping on his breast, till the chest was broke, and he expired. They afterwards divided the body into small pieces, and conveyed it through the necessary into the sea, because the throwing it over-board would have alarmed the centry. Next day twenty-seven of the French prisoners being carried on shore, one of them gave information of the murder; in consequence of which the criminals were secured, brought to trial, condemned, and punished with death.

Nor were the instances of cruel assassination which prevailed at this juncture confined to Great Britain. At the latter end of the foregoing year an atrocious massacre was perpetrated by two Genoese mariners, upon the master and crew of an English vessel, among whom they were inrolled. These monsters of cruelty were in different watches, a circumstance that favoured the execution of the horrid plan they had concerted. When one of them retired to rest with his fellows of the watch, consisting of the mate and two seamen, he waited till they were fast asleep, and then butchered them all with a knife. Having so far succeeded without discovery, he returned to the deck and communicated the exploit to his associate; then they suddenly attacked the master of the vessel, and cleft his head with an hatchet, which they likewise used in murdering the man who stood at the helm; a third was likewise dispatched, and no Englishman remained alive but the master's son, a boy, who lamented his father's death with incessant tears and cries for three days; at the expiration of which he was likewise sacrificed, because the assassins were disturbed by his clamour.

This barbarous tragedy was acted within sixty leagues of the Rock of Lisbon; but the vessel was taken between the capes Ortugal and Finisterre by the captain of a French privateer called La Favourite, who seeing the deck stained with blood, and finding all the papers of the ship destroyed, began to suspect that the master and crew had been murdered. He accordingly taxed them with the murder, and they confessed the particulars. The privateer touched at Vigo, where the captain imparted this detail to the English consul; but the prize, with the two villains on board, was sent to Bayonne in France, where it is to be hoped, for the honour of humanity, they were brought to condign punishment, notwithstanding the war that subsisted between the two nations; for there are certain established rights of general justice and humanity which no particular war can destroy.

A massacre, if possible still more shocking and horrid, was committed about the same time by a negro at St. Eustatia. This man being at work on a ship in the harbour, and having had some words with a white person, stabbed him in his passion; upon which another negro told him that he would certainly be put to death for this cruel murder, and that he could be subjected to no greater punishment if he had killed twenty more. The fellow, rendered desperate by this intimation, snatched up a knife, and throwing himself into the water, swam immediately to shore. The first person he met happened to be an English sailor, and him he cut across the belly in such a manner that his bowels came out. This done, he rushed in a moment into a woollen-draper's shop, and stabbed the apprentice, who was sitting behind the counter: then he ran into the street, and dangerously wounded two or three others. By this time the people were greatly alarmed; but the fellow being desperate, every body shunned him. The governor offered a reward to any one who would seize him alive, and a sailor undertook it, armed with a musket; but if he found it impracticable, he was ordered to shoot him. The negro, who was then at the wharf-side, alone, saw him coming, and met him with great resolution. He made an essay to stab the sailor, by giving a sudden leap upon him; but the tar avoided the blow, and struck him with the butt-end of the musket so as to break his arm. Upon this the negro, with great agility, seized the knife in the other hand, and made another push at the sailor, but with as little success as before; and by another blow he was, with the assistance of some other persons who had gathered round, secured alive. He was immediately brought to trial, and condemned; and next day hung alive in irons upon a gibbet, where he continued in the most violent agonies, and shrieking in the most terrible manner for the space of three days. His greatest cry was for water, the weather being then extremely hot, and the sun beating full upon him.

I shall conclude this bloody register with the account of a murder, remarkable in all its circumstances, for which a person, called Eugene Aram, suffered at York in the course of this year. This man, who exercised the profession of a school-master at Knareborough, had, as far back as the year 1745, been concerned with one Houseman in robbing and murdering Daniel Clarke, whom they had previously persuaded to borrow a considerable quantity of valuable effects from different persons in the neighbourhood, on false pretences, that he might retire with the booty. He accordingly filled a sack with these particulars, and begun his retreat with his two perfidious associates, who suddenly fell upon him, deprived him of life, and, having buried the body in a cave, took possession of the plunder. Though Clarke disappeared at once in such a mysterious manner, no suspicion fell upon the assassins; and Aram, who was the chief contriver and agent in the murder, moved his habitation to another part of the country.

In the summer of the present year, Houseman being employed, among other labourers, in repairing the public highway, they, in digging for gravel by the road-side, discovered the skeleton of a human creature, which the majority supposed to be the bones of Daniel Clarke. This opinion was no sooner broached than Houseman, as it were by some supernatural impulse which he could not resist, declared that it was not the skeleton of Clarke, inasmuch as his body had been interred in a place called St. Robert's Cave, where they would find it with the head turned to a certain corner. He was immediately apprehended, examined, admitted as evidence for the crown, and discovered the particulars of the murder.

The skeleton of Clarke having been found exactly in the place and manner he had described, Eugene Aram, who now acted as usher to a grammar school in the county of Norfolk, was secured, and brought to trial at the York assizes. There, his own wife corroborating the testimony of Houseman, he was found guilty, and received sentence, notwithstanding a very artful and learned defence, in which he proved, from argument and example, the danger of convicting a man upon circumstantial evidence. Finding all his remonstrances ineffectual, he recommended himself in pathetic terms to the king's mercy; and if ever murder was intitled to indulgence, perhaps it might have been extended, not improperly, to this man, whose genius, in itself prodigious, might have exerted itself in works of general utility. He had, in spite of all the disadvantages attending a low birth and straitened circumstances, by the dint of his own capacity and application, made considerable progress in mathematics and philosophy, acquired all the languages ancient and modern, and executed part of a Celtic dictionary, which, had he lived to finish it, might have thrown some light upon the origin and obscurities of the European history.

Convinced, at last, that he had nothing to hope from the clemency of the government, he wrote a short poem in defence of suicide; and on the day fixed for his execution, opened the veins of his left arm with a razor which he had concealed for that purpose. Though he was much weakened by the effusion of blood before this attempt was discovered; yet, as the instrument had missed the artery, he did not expire till he was carried to the gibbet and underwent the sentence of the law. His body was conveyed to Knareborough-forest, and hung in chains near the place where the murder was committed. These are some of the most remarkable instances of homicide that appeared in the course of this year, which was more distinguished than almost any preceding one for barbarous acts of this nature.

His present majesty, then prince of Wales, having, in the beginning of June, entered the twenty-second year of his age, the anniversary of his birth was celebrated with great rejoicings at court, and the king received compliments of congratulation on the majority of a prince, who seemed born to fulfil the hopes and complete the happiness of Great Britain. The city of London presented an address to the king on this occasion, replete with expressions of loyalty and affection, assuring his majesty that no hostile threats could intimidate a people animated by the love of liberty, who, confiding in the Divine Providence, and in his majesty's experienced wisdom and vigorous councils, were resolved to exert their utmost efforts towards enabling their sovereign to repel the insults and defeat the attempts made by the ancient enemies of his crown and kingdom.

Congratulations of the same kind were offered by other cities, towns, corporations, and communities, who vied with each other in professions of attachment; and indeed there was not the least trace of disaffection perceivable at this juncture in any part of the island.

So little were the citizens of London distressed by the expence, or incommoded by the operations of the war, that they found leisure to plan and funds to execute magnificent works of art, for the ornament of the metropolis and the convenience of commerce. They had obtained an act of parliament, empowering them to build a new bridge over the Thames, from Blackfriars to the opposite shore, about midway between those of London and Westminster. Commissioners were appointed to put this act in execution; and at a court of common-council, it was resolved that a sum, not exceeding one hundred and forty-four thousand pounds, should be forthwith raised, within the space of eight years, by instalments, not exceeding thirty thousand pounds in one year, to be paid into the chamber of London: that the persons advancing the money should have an interest at the rate of four pounds per cent. per annum, to be paid half yearly by the chamberlain, yet redeemable at the expiration of the first ten years: and that the chamberlain should affix the city's seal to such instruments as the committee might think fit to give for securing the payment of the said annuities. Such were the first effectual steps taken towards the execution of a laudable measure, which, however violently opposed in the sequel, is now carried on with equal harmony and expedition.

The inhabitants of London were, in the course of this year, greatly alarmed by two dreadful fires, which broke out in different parts of the city at no great interval of time. The first happened in the month of November, in the neighbourhood of the Royal Exchange, and burned with such fury that, notwithstanding the assistance of the firemen and engines, employed under the personal direction of the magistracy, it destroyed a good number of houses, and damaged many more. That whole quarter of the town was filled with consternation: some individuals were beggared; one or two perished in the flames, and some were buried in the ruin ruin of the houses that sunk under the disaster. The other broke out in the month of December, at a cabinet-maker's in King's-street, Covent Garden, and raged with such violence that it consumed no less than fifty houses; and the loss sustained by the unhappy sufferers amounted to upwards of seventy thousand pounds.

Some successful attempts were about this time made towards the discovery of the longitude at sea, that great desideratum in navigation; for the ascertainment of which so many nations have offered a public recompence, and in the investigation of which so many mathematical heads have been disordered. Some of those who now appeared candidates for the prize deserved encouragement for the ingenuity of their several systems; but he who seemed to enjoy the pre-eminence, in the opinion and favour of the public, was Mr. Irwin, a native of Ireland, who contrived a chair so artfully poised, that a person sitting in it on board a ship, even in a rough sea, can, through a telescope, observe the immersion and emerſion of Jupiter's ſatellites, without being interrupted or incommoded by the motion of the vessel. This gentleman was favoured with the assistance and protection of commodore lord Howe, in whose presence the experiment was tried in several ships at sea with such success, that his lordship granted a certificate signifying his approbation; and in consequence of this Mr. Irwin is said to have obtained a considerable reward from the board of admiralty.

The people of England, happy in their situation, felt none of the furious storms of war which desolated the neighbouring countries; but, enriched by a surprising augmentation of commerce, enjoyed all the security of peace, and all the pleasures of taste and affluence. The university of Oxford having conferred the office of their chancellor, vacant by the death of the earl of Arran, upon another nobleman of equal honour and integrity, namely, the earl of Westmoreland, he made a public entrance into that celebrated seat of learning with great magnificence, and was installed amidst the encœnia, which were celebrated with such classical elegance of pomp as might have rivalled the chief Roman festival of the Augustan age. The chancellor elect was attended by a splendid train of the nobility and persons of distinction. The city of Oxford was filled with a vast concourse of strangers. The processions were contrived with taste, and conducted with decorum. The installation was performed with the most striking solemnity. The congratulatory verses and public speeches breathed the spirit of old Rome: and the ceremony was closed by Dr. King, that venerable sage of St. Mary Hall, who pronounced an oration in praise of the new chancellor with all the flow of Tully, animated by the fire of Demosthenes.

In the spring of this year the liberal arts received a severe blow in the death of George-Frederic Handel, the most celebrated master in music which this age has produced. He was by birth a German; but had studied in Italy, and afterwards settled in England, where he met with the most favourable reception, and resided above half a century, universally admired for his stupendous genius in the sublime parts of musical composition.

The following event is so surprising and deplorable in all its circumstances, that it may well claim a place in the history of England. A sloop called the Dolphin, bound from the Canaries to New York, met with such unfavourable weather, that she was detained one hundred and sixty-five days in the passage, and the provision of the ship was altogether expended before the first fifty days were elapsed. The wretched crew had devoured their dog, cat, and all the shoes on board: at length, being reduced to the last extremity, they agreed to cast lots for their lives, that the body of him upon whom the lot should fall might serve for some time to support the survivors. The wretched victim was one Antonio Galatia, a Spanish gentleman and passenger. Him they shot with a musquet; and having cut off his head, threw it overboard; but the intrails and the rest of the carcase they greedily devoured. This horrid banquet having, as it were, fleshed the famished crew, they began to talk of another sacrifice; from which, however, they were diverted by the influence and remonstrances of their captain, Mr. Baron, who prevailed upon them to be satisfied with about an inch and a half square of leather to each man per diem, cut from a pair of breeches that were found in the cabin. Upon this calamitous pittance, together with the grass which grew plentifully upon the deck, these poor objects made shift to subsist for twenty days; at the expiration of which they were relieved, and taken on board one captain Bradshaw, who chanced to fall in with them at sea. By this time the whole crew, consisting of seven men, were so squalid and emaciated, as to exhibit an appearance at once pitteous and terrible; and so reduced in point of strength, that it was found necessary to use ropes and tackle for hoisting them from one ship to another.

In the month of November the British parliament was opened by commission; and the commons attending in the house of peers, the lord-keeper made a speech to the members, importing, that his majesty had directed him to assure them, that he thought himself peculiarly happy in being able to convoke them in a situation of affairs so glorious to his crown and advantageous to his kingdoms; that the king saw and devoutly adored the hand of Providence in the many signal successes, both by sea and land, with which his arms had been blessed in the course of the last campaign: that he reflected with great satisfaction on the confidence which the parliament had placed in him, by making such ample provisions, and intrusting him with such extensive powers, for carrying on a war which the defence of their valuable rights and possessions, together with the preservation of the commerce of his people, had rendered both just and necessary: that he needed not remind them of the late successes of the British arms, the reduction of Goree on the coast of Africa, the conquest of so many important places in America, the defeat of the French army in Canada, the reduction of their capital city Quebec, effected with so much honour to the courage and conduct of his majesty's officers and forces; the important advantage obtained by the British Squadron off Cape Lagos, and the effectual blocking up for so many months the principal part of the French navy in their

their own harbours; events which must have filled the hearts of all his majesty's faithful subjects with the sincerest joy, and convinced his parliament that there had been no want of vigilance or vigour on his part, in exerting those means which they with so much prudence and public-spirited zeal had put into his majesty's hands: that the national advantages had extended even as far as the East Indies, where, by the Divine Blessing, the dangerous designs of his majesty's enemies had miscarried, and that valuable branch of commerce had received great benefit and protection: that the memorable victory gained over the French at Minden had long made a deep impression on the minds of his majesty's people: that if the crisis in which this battle was fought, the superior number of the enemy, the great and able conduct of his majesty's general, prince Ferdinand of Brunswic, were considered, that action must be the subject of lasting admiration and thankfulness: that if any thing could fill the breasts of his majesty's good subjects with still farther degrees of exultation, it would be the distinguished and unbroken valour of the British troops, owned and applauded by those whom they overcame: that the glory they had gained was not merely their own, but, in a national view, was one of the most important circumstances of our success, as it must be a striking admonition to our enemies with whom they have to contend: that his majesty's good brother and ally the king of Prussia, attacked and surrounded by so many considerable powers, had, by his magnanimity and abilities, and the bravery of his troops, been able, in a surprising manner, to defeat the schemes concerted for his destruction by so many formidable enemies: that as the king of Great Britain had not entered into this war from views of ambition, so he did not wish to continue it from motives of resentment: that the desire of his majesty's heart was to see a stop put to the effusion of Christian blood: that, whenever such terms of peace could be established, as should be just and honourable for his majesty and his allies; and by procuring such advantages as, from the successes of his majesty's arms, might in reason and equity be expected, should bring along with them full security for the future, his majesty would rejoice to see the repose of Europe restored on such solid and durable foundations; and his faithful subjects, to whose liberal support and unshaken firmness his majesty owed so much, happy in the enjoyment of the blessings of peace and tranquillity; but, in order to this great and desirable end, he said his majesty was confident the parliament would agree with him, that it was necessary to make ample provision for carrying on the war, in all parts, with the utmost vigour: that the great supplies which the commons had granted in the last session of parliament, had been faithfully employed for the purposes for which they were allotted; but the uncommon extent of the war, and the various services necessary to be provided for, in order to secure success to his majesty's measures, had unavoidably occasioned extraordinary expences: that his majesty took the highest satisfaction in that harmony and good agreement which was so conspicuous among his subjects; he was happy in seeing it continued and confirmed; and that experience had shewn how much the nation owed to this union, which alone could secure the true happiness of his people.

This speech was highly applauded, not only by the parliament, but also by the nation in general. As the addresses of both houses were conceived nearly in the same strain, I shall content myself with exhibiting to the reader a complete copy of that of the commons. It was expressed in the following terms:

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons of Great Britain, in parliament assembled, return your majesty our most humble thanks for the speech delivered, by your majesty's command, to both houses of parliament.

"Permit us, Sir, with the sincerest zeal and duty, to congratulate your majesty on the glorious and uninterrupted series of success and victory which hath attended your majesty's arms during the whole course of this distinguished and memorable year.

"With the deepest reverence and most devout gratitude to Divine Providence, we acknowledge that manifest blessing and protection which God hath vouchsafed to bestow upon your majesty's counsels and arms, and offer up our most ardent vows and prayers for its continuance.

"Your majesty's faithful commons will not attempt to enumerate all the advantages and glories derived to your majesty and these kingdoms, from the various successes which have been extended into every quarter of the world; but we humbly beg leave to assure your majesty, that our hearts are filled with a lively and most grateful sense of the happy consequences which, under God, are owing to the wisdom, vigilance, and vigour of your majesty's measures in the prosecution of this just and necessary war; particularly, the taking of the island of Goree, and the extension of our commerce on the coast of Africa: the defeat of the French fleet in the East Indies, and the repulse of the land forces before Madras, whereby the dangerous designs of our enemies there have miscarried, and protection hath been given to our trade and settlement in those countries: the valuable conquest of Guadalupe and Marigalante in the West Indies; the reduction of so many forts and places in North America, completed and crowned by that glorious and decisive victory over the French army in Canada, and the surrender of their capital city Quebec, effected with so much courage and conduct of your majesty's officers, both by sea and land, and with so much lustre to your intrepid forces; the important success of your majesty's fleet, in pursuing, taking, and destroying a considerable part of the French squadron off Cape Lagos; and blocking up for so many months the rest of the navy of France, in their own ports, which has greatly augmented the distress of our enemies, whilst it has protected and secured our commerce and navigation.

"Nor can we forget that critical, signal, and memorable defeat of the French army near Minden, so justly the subject of lasting admiration and thankfulness, if we consider the superior numbers of the enemy, the great and able conduct of his serene highness prince Ferdinand of Brunswic, or the unconquerable valour of your majesty's troops.

"When

“ When we reflect upon this continued train of successes, part of which would have been sufficient to have signalized this long and active campaign, it is impossible for us not to express the highest satisfaction at the great ability, resolution, and perfect harmony, so conspicuous in your majesty’s admirals and generals throughout the execution of your commands; and at the ardent courage which hath manifested itself in the behaviour of the officers and forces by sea and land with such personal and national glory. Nothing but this spirit could have enabled them to surmount every difficulty arising from the superior number and situation of the enemy; and we are persuaded that the like resolution, ardour, and zeal, exerted and animated by these best incentives, your majesty’s gracious acceptance and royal approbation of their eminent services, followed by the warmest and most universal applause of their country, will continue to give terror to the enemies, and confidence to the allies of Great Britain.

“ We view, with the highest admiration, the magnanimity and unexampled efforts of that great prince, your majesty’s ally the king of Prussia, whose consummate genius, unwearied activity, and unshaken constancy of mind, seconded by the bravery of his troops, have been able, in every situation, to supply resources sufficient to resist the united forces of so many and such formidable powers.

“ Your majesty’s faithful commons feel, with due gratitude, your paternal care and concern for the peace and happiness of your people; and cannot too much admire that true greatness of mind which disposes your heart, in the midst of prosperities, to wish that a stop may be put to the effusion of Christian blood, and that public tranquility may be restored.

“ We entirely rely on your majesty’s known wisdom and firmness, that this desirable object, whenever it shall be attained, will be on such terms as shall be just and honourable for your majesty and your allies; and shall bring along with them full security for the future, on solid and durable foundations, by procuring such advantages as may, in reason and equity, be expected from the success of our arms, and which will fix, in the minds of a grateful people, the lasting remembrance of this happy æra, and of the benefits derived to them, under your majesty’s gracious and auspicious government.

“ In order to effect this great end, we are thoroughly sensible that ample provision must be made for carrying on the war, in all parts, with the utmost vigour; and we assure your majesty that we will cheerfully grant your majesty such supplies as shall be found necessary to sustain, and press with effect, all our extensive operations against the enemy, and at the same time, by the blessing of God, to repel and frustrate their daring designs against these kingdoms; convinced, from the long experience we have had of your majesty’s wisdom and goodness, that they will be applied in such a manner as will best answer these purposes.

“ We cannot sufficiently testify our grateful sense of the high satisfaction which your majesty has been pleased to express, in that perfect union and good harmony which so happily subsists among your faithful subjects, the salutary effects of which have been most conspicuous; and the pleasing experience we have had of them, joined to your majesty’s paternal recommendation, must be the most powerful motives to enforce the continuance of those dispositions, so essential to the full exertion of our utmost strength, as well as to the tranquility, good order, and happiness of your majesty’s people.”

The addresses of the two houses were no sooner presented than the commons proceeded to settle the supply. For the service of the ensuing year they voted seventy thousand seamen, including eighteen thousand three hundred and fifty-five marines; and for their maintenance allotted three millions six hundred and forty thousand pounds. The number of land-forces, including the British troops in Germany, and the invalids, they fixed at fifty-seven thousand two hundred and ninety-four men, and granted for their subsistence one million three hundred eighty-three thousand seven hundred and forty-eight pounds ten-pence. For maintaining other forces in the plantations, Gibraltar, Guadalupe, Africa, and the East Indies, they allowed eight hundred forty-six thousand one hundred and sixty-eight pounds nineteen shillings; for the expence of four regiments on the Irish establishment, serving in North America, they voted thirty-five thousand seven hundred and forty-four pounds eight shillings and four-pence. For pay to the general and staff-officers, and officers of the hospital for the land forces, they assigned fifty-four thousand four hundred and fifty-four pounds eleven shillings and nine-pence. They voted for the expence of the militia in South and North Britain, the sum of one hundred two thousand and six pounds four shillings and eight-pence. They granted for the maintenance of thirty-eight thousand seven hundred and fifty men, being the troops of Hanover, Wolfenbuttle, Saxe-Gotha, and Buckeburg, retained in the service of Great Britain, the sum of four hundred forty-seven thousand eight hundred eighty-two pounds ten shillings and five-pence halfpenny; and for nineteen thousand Hessian troops, in the same pay, they gave three hundred sixty-six thousand seven hundred twenty-five pounds one shilling and six-pence. They afterwards bestowed the sum of one hundred eight thousand and twelve pounds twelve shillings and seven-pence, for defraying the additional expence of augmentations in the troops of Hanover and Hesse, and the British army serving in the empire. For the ordinary of the navy, including half pay to sea officers; for carrying on the building of two hospitals, one near Gosport, and the other in the neighbourhood of Plymouth; for the support of the hospital at Greenwich; for purchasing ground, erecting wharfs, and other accommodations necessary for refitting the fleets at Halifax in Nova Scotia; for the charge of the office of ordnance, and defraying the extraordinary expence incurred by that office in the course of the last year, they allowed seven hundred eighty-one thousand four hundred and eighty-nine pounds six shillings and six-pence. Towards paying off the navy debt, buildings, rebuildings, and repairs of the king’s ships, together with the charge of transport-service, they granted one million seven hundred and one thousand seventy-eight pounds sixteen shillings and six-pence. For defraying the extraordinary dinary expences of the land forces, and other services not provided for by parliament, comprehending the pensions for the widows of reduced officers, they allotted the sum of nine hundred fifty-five thousand three hundred and forty-four pounds fifteen shillings and five-pence halfpenny. They voted one million to empower his majesty to discharge the like sum, raised in pursuance of an act made in the last session of parliament, and charged upon the first aids or supplies to be granted in this session of parliament. They gave six hundred and seventy thousand pounds for enabling his majesty to make good his engagements with the king of Prussia, pursuant to a new convention between him and that monarch, concluded on the ninth day of November in the present year. Fifteen thousand pounds they allowed, upon account, towards enabling the principal officers of his majesty's ordnance to defray the necessary charges and expences of taking down and removing the present magazine for gun-powder, situated in the neighbourhood of Greenwich, and of erecting it in some less dangerous situation. Sixty thousand pounds they gave to enable his majesty to fulfil his engagements with the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, pursuant to the separate article of a treaty between the two powers, renewed in the month of November; the sum to be paid as his most Serene Highness should think it most convenient, in order to facilitate the means by which the landgrave might again fix his residence in his own dominions, and by his presence give fresh courage to his faithful subjects. Five hundred thousand pounds they voted, upon account, as a present supply towards defraying the charges of forage, bread, bread waggons, train of artillery, wood, straw, provisions, and contingencies of his majesty's combined army under the command of prince Ferdinand. To the Foundling hospital they granted five thousand pounds; and fifteen thousand for improving, widening, and enlarging the passage over and through London-bridge. To replace divers sums taken from the sinking fund, they granted two hundred twenty-five thousand two hundred and eighty-one pounds nineteen shillings and four-pence. For the subsistence of reduced officers, including the allowances to the several officers and private men of the two troops of horse-guards and regiment of horse reduced, and to the superannuated gentlemen of the four troops of horse-guards, they voted thirty-eight thousand five hundred and ninety-seven pounds nine shillings. Upon account, for the support of the colonies of Nova Scotia and Georgia, they granted twenty-one thousand six hundred twenty-four pounds two shillings and two-pence. For enabling the king to give a proper compensation to the provinces in North America, for the expences they might incur in levying and maintaining troops, according as the vigour and activity of those respective provinces should be thought by his majesty to merit, they advanced the sum of two hundred thousand pounds. The East India company they gratified with twenty thousand pounds towards enabling them to defray the expence of a military force in their settlements, in lieu of a battalion of the king's troops now returned to Ireland. Twenty-five thousand pounds were provided for the payment of the out-pensioners of Chelsea-hospital. For subsequent augmentations of the British forces, since the first estimate of guards and garrisons for the ensuing year was presented, they allowed one hundred thirty-four thousand one hundred thirty-nine pounds seventeen shillings and four-pence. They further voted, upon account, towards enabling the governors and guardians of the Foundling-hospital to maintain, educate, and bind apprentice, the children admitted into the said charity, the sum of forty-seven thousand two hundred and eighty-five pounds. For defraying the expence of maintaining the militia in South and North Britain, to the twenty-fourth day of December of the ensuing year, they voted an additional grant of two hundred ninety thousand eight hundred and twenty-six pounds sixteen shillings and eight-pence: and, moreover, they granted fourscore thousand pounds, upon account, towards defraying the charge of pay and cloathing of the unembodied militia for the year, ending on the twenty-fifth day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-one. For reimbursing the colony of New-York their expences in furnishing provisions and stores to the troops raised by them for his majesty's service, in the campaign of the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, they allowed two thousand nine hundred and seventy-seven pounds seven shillings and eight-pence: and for maintaining the British forts and settlements on the coast of Africa, they renewed the grant of ten thousand pounds. For the maintenance and augmentation of the troops of Brunswic, in the pay of Great Britain, for the ensuing year, pursuant to an ulterior convention concluded and signed at Paderborn on the fifth day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty, they granted the sum of ninety thousand seven hundred and sixty-nine pounds eight shillings and eleven-pence farthing: and for the troops of Hesse Cassel in the same pay, during the same period, they allotted one hundred and one thousand ninety-six pounds three shillings and two pence. For the extraordinary expences of the land forces, and other services incurred, from the twenty-fourth day of December following, and not provided for, they granted the sum of four hundred and twenty thousand one hundred and twenty pounds one shilling. To make good the deficiency of the grants for the service of this present year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine, they assigned the sum of seventy-five thousand one hundred and seventy pounds three-pence farthing. For printing the Journals of the House of Commons they gave five thousand pounds; and six hundred thirty-four pounds thirteen shillings and seven-pence as interest, at the rate of four per cent. per annum, from the twenty-fifth day of August in the present year to the same day of April next, for the sum of twenty-three thousand eight hundred pounds eleven shillings and eleven-pence remaining in the office of ordnance, and not paid into the hands of the deputy of the king's remembrancer of the court of Exchequer, as directed by an act made in the last session of parliament, to make compensation for lands and hereditaments purchased for his majesty's service at Chatham, Portsmouth, and Plymouth, by reason of doubts and difficulties which had arisen touching the execution of the said act. For defraying the extraordinary charge of the mint, during the present year, they allowed eleven thousand nine hundred and

and forty pounds thirteen shillings and ten-pence; and two thousand five hundred pounds, upon account, for paying the debts claimed and sustained upon a forfeited estate in North Britain. They likewise allowed twelve thousand eight hundred and seventy-four pounds fifteen shillings and ten-pence, for defraying the charge of a regiment of light dragoons, and of an additional company to the corps commanded by lieutenant-colonel Vaughan. Finally, they voted one million, upon account, to enable the king to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred or to be incurred for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty; and to take all such measures as might be necessary to defeat any enterprize or designs of his enemies, as the exigency of affairs might require.

In a word, the sum total granted in this session of parliament amounted to fifteen millions five hundred three thousand five hundred and sixty-three pounds fifteen shillings and nine-pence halfpenny; a sum which, however immense, and even seemingly enormous, was no more than was absolutely necessary for carrying on the war with that spirit and vigour with which it had hitherto been prosecuted.

The funds established for raising this sum consisted of the following particulars. The land-tax at four shillings in the pound, and the malt-tax, were continued, as the standing revenue of Great Britain. The committee resolved that the sum of eight millions should be raised by transferable annuities, after the rate of four pounds per centum: that an additional capital of three pounds should be added to every hundred pounds advanced, to consist of a lottery ticket valued at ten pounds, to be attended also with transferable annuities, after the rate of four per cent. per annum, to commence from the fifth day of January, in the year 1761, to continue for twenty years, and then be reduced to three pounds per cent. per annum: and that the said sum of eight millions should bear the same interest of four per cent. commencing on the same day, to continue for twenty-one years, and then be reduced to three pounds per centum: that the said annuities should be transferable at the bank of England, and be redeemable by parliament, in the whole or in part, by sums not less than five hundred thousand pounds at one time, after the expiration of twenty-one years, and not sooner, six months notice having been given of such payments respectively: that every subscriber should, on or before the fifteenth day of January next, make a deposit of fifteen pounds per cent. on such sums as he should chuse to subscribe towards raising the eight millions, with the cashiers of the bank of England, as a security for his making the future payments, which were fixed in the following manner; ten per cent. on or before the twenty-sixth day of February next; ten per cent. on or before the twenty-fifth day of March next; ten per cent. on or before the twenty-ninth day of April next; the same proportion on the last day of May, the third day of July, the fourteenth day of August, the sixteenth day of September, and the twenty-ninth day of October; which several sums so received should, by the said cashiers, be paid into the receipt of the Exchequer, to be applied, from time to time, to such services as should then have been voted by the houses in this session of parliament, and not otherwise: that such of the proprietors of tallies and orders made out at the Exchequer, by virtue of an act passed in the last session of parliament, for enabling the king to raise the sum of one million, for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, as should be desirous of subscribing a sum equal to the principal sum contained in such respective orders; and should, on or before the eighth day of January, produce the said orders, and signify such their desire to the said cashiers, should be admitted subscribers for such sums: that any tallies or orders made out at the Exchequer, by virtue of the said act, should be received by the said cashiers as cash, to the amount of the respective sums contained in such tallies or orders, and the interest that should be due thereupon, as well in making the said deposit, as in all subsequent payments: that the tallies and orders so received, should be taken at the receipt of the Exchequer, and allowed in the payments to be made by the cashiers, for the amount of such principal sums and interest: and that every subscriber who should pay in the whole of this subscription, on or before the sixteenth day of September, should be allowed a discount, after the rate of three pounds per cent. per annum, from the day such subscription should be so completed, to the twenty-ninth day of October.

The committee further resolved, that an additional tax of three-pence should be paid for every bushel of malt made in England and Wales, and three halfpence for every bushel made in Scotland; and so proportionably for any greater or less quantity, to be paid by the makers thereof: that three halfpence should be paid for every bushel of malt conveyed from Scotland to England and Wales: and that the afore-mentioned annuities and lottery should be charged upon the said duties on malt, for which the sinking fund should be a collateral security. With regard to the same imposition they resolved, that this new duty should, both in England and Scotland, be paid for every bushel of malt, whether ground or unground, which, having been made before the commencement of these additional duties, should, on or after the said day of commencement, be in the possession of any maltster, or maker of malt, for sale, seller, or retailer of malt, brewer, distiller, inn-keeper, victualler, vinegar-maker, or any person or persons in trust for them, or for their use: that the monies arising by the said duties should be carried to, and made part of the fund for the payment of the annuities and lottery, allowing the sum of eight millions granted to his majesty in the present session of parliament.

They determined that a stamp duty of ten shillings should be charged on every piece of vellum or parchment, or sheet of paper, on which any licence for making and selling measures of capacity should be engrossed, written, or printed, as well as upon every piece of vellum or paper on which a licence, for making and selling weights, should be written or printed. They resolved, that a new duty of five-pence should be charged upon every gallon of low wines or spirits, of the first extraction, made or drawn from any sort of liquor or wash brewed of malt or corn, or from brewers wash or tilts, over and above all other duties charged or chargeable thereon, to be paid by the distillers distillers or makers thereof: that for every gallon of strong waters, or aqua vitæ, made for sale, of the materials aforesaid, one shilling and three-pence, over and above all other duties charged and chargeable thereon, should be paid by the distillers or makers thereof; and that the same duty should be exacted of the distillers or makers, for every gallon of low wines or spirits of the first extraction, made or drawn from any foreign or imported materials, or any mixture therewith, over and above all other duties: that a new duty of eight-pence per gallon should be imposed upon spirits drawn in Great Britain from any foreign or imported materials, or any mixture therewith: that six-pence three farthings, over and above all other duties chargeable thereon, should be paid for every gallon of low wines, or spirits of the first extraction, made or drawn from cyder, or any sort of British materials, except those before mentioned, or any mixture therewith; and that the distillers and makers should pay one shilling one penny three farthings for every gallon of spirits made for sale from cyder, or any other British materials, except those already mentioned, over and above all other duties chargeable in the same article: that, in order to encourage the exportation of spirits drawn or made in Great Britain, the like drawbacks and allowances should be made, under proper regulations, upon the exportation of rectified spirits made or drawn in Great Britain, as are now payable upon the exportation of home-made raw spirits; and that, as a further encouragement, an additional drawback or allowance of twenty-four pounds ten shillings per ton should be paid, upon the exportation of all such spirits: that an additional duty of one shilling for every gallon of single brandy, spirits, or aqua vitæ, imported from beyond seas; and of two shillings for every gallon of such spirits above proof, commonly called double brandy, so imported, should be paid by the importer; and that these additional duties should stand appropriated and be applied to the same uses and purposes, respectively, to which the present duties on spirituous liquors are now applied and appropriated.

The committee resolved, that the three pound per cent. annuities, amounting to six millions six hundred thousand pounds, together with the additional capital of fifteen pounds added to every hundred pounds advanced towards the said sum, amounting to nine hundred and ninety thousand pounds, granted in the last session, should be, with the consent of the several proprietors, made part of the joint stock of three pounds per cent. annuities, transferable at the bank of England, consolidated by the acts in the twenty-fifth, twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth, and thirty-second of his present majesty's reign; and the charges and expences in respect thereof, be charged upon and paid out of the sinking fund, until redemption thereof by parliament, in the same and like manner as the annuities consolidated as aforesaid are paid and payable; and that such persons as should not, on or before the twentieth day of June ensuing, signify their dissent, in books to be opened at the bank of England for that purpose, should be deemed assenting thereto: that all monies arising from the fifth day of January next, or that may afterwards arise from the produce of the subsidy of poundage upon certain goods and merchandizes imported or to be imported into the kingdom; and the additional inland duty on coffee and chocolate, which were made a fund for payment of three pounds per cent. per annum, at the bank of England, on six millions six hundred thousand pounds, by virtue of an act towards the supply of this year, 1759; as also the additional capital of fifteen pounds added to every hundred advanced towards the said sum, amounting to nine hundred and ninety thousand pounds, should be made part of the sinking fund: that all duties charged upon rum or spirits of the growth, produce, and manufacture of his majesty's sugar plantations, imported into Great Britain, should be drawn back upon the re-exportation; and that an additional drawback or allowance of three pounds three shillings per ton should be paid upon the exportation of spirits drawn in Great Britain from molasses, over and above all other drawbacks and allowances payable thereon.

They resolved to continue in force several acts and clauses relating to the jurisdiction, powers, and authorities vested in commissioners for licensing hackney chairs and coaches; and agreed, that the act for making sail-cloth, now near expiring, should be protracted. They resolved, that for raising the sum of one million, granted to his majesty towards discharging the debt of the navy, and also the sum of five hundred thousand pounds, should be raised by loans, or Exchequer bills, to be charged upon the first aids to be granted in the next session of parliament; and such Exchequer bills, if not discharged, with interest, on or before the twenty-fifth day of March, in the year 1761, to be exchanged and received in payment, in such manner as Exchequer bills have usually been exchanged and received: that the sum of two millions six hundred two thousand seven hundred and six pounds nine shillings and nine-pence, should be issued and applied out of such monies as should or might arise from the surplus, excess, or overplus monies, and other revenues composing the sinking fund: and that the sum of one million should be raised by loans, or Exchequer bills, to be charged on the first aids to be granted in the next session of parliament.

The whole provision made by the committee of ways and means, amounted to sixteen millions one hundred thirty thousand five hundred and sixty-one pounds nine shillings and eight-pence, exceeding the grant for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty, in the sum of six hundred twenty-six thousand nine hundred and ninety-seven pounds thirteen shillings and ten-pence halfpenny. This excess, however, will not appear extraordinary, when we consider that it was destined to make good the premium of two hundred and forty thousand pounds to the subscribers upon the eight million loan, as well as the deficiencies in the other grants, which never fail to make a considerable article in the supply of every session.

It will not be necessary to enumerate all the acts that were founded upon the resolutions touching the supply. It may be proper, however, to observe, that in the act for the land-tax, and in the act for the malt-tax, there was a clause of credit, empowering the commissioners of the Treasury to raise the money, which they produced by loans of

Exchequer bills, bearing an interest of four per cent. per annum, that is, one per cent. higher than the interest usually granted in time of peace. While the house of commons deliberated on the bill for granting to his majesty several duties upon malt, and for raising a certain sum of money to be charged on the said duties, a petition was presented by the maltsters of Ipswich and parts adjacent, against an additional duty on the stock of malt in hand: but no regard was paid to this remonstrance, and the bill, with several new amendments, passed through both houses, under the title of "An act for granting to his majesty several duties upon malt, and for raising the sum of eight millions by way of annuities and a lottery, to be charged on the said duties; and to prevent the fraudulent obtaining of allowances in the gauging of corn making into malt; and for making four duplicates of Exchequer bills, tickets, certificates, receipts, annuity orders, and other orders lost, burned, or otherwise destroyed."

The other three bills, that turned wholly on the supply, were passed in common course, without the least opposition in either house, and received the royal assent by commission at the end of the session. The first of these, intitled, A bill for enabling his majesty to raise a certain sum of money for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, contained a clause of appropriation, added to it by instruction; and the bank was enabled to lend the million, which the commissioners of the Treasury were empowered by the act to borrow, at the interest of four pounds per cent. The second, granting to his majesty a certain sum of money out of the sinking fund for the service of the year 1760, comprehended a clause of credit for borrowing the money thereby granted; and another clause empowering the bank to lend it without any limitation of interest. And the third, enabling his majesty to raise a certain sum of money towards discharging the debt of the navy, and for naval services during the ensuing year, enacted, that the Exchequer bills thereby to be issued, should not be received, or pass to any receiver or collector of the public revenue, or at the receipt of the Exchequer, before the twenty-sixth day of March in the year 1761.

As the act of the preceding session, prohibiting the malt distillery, was to expire at Christmas, the commons, thinking it necessary to consider of effectual methods for laying this branch of business under proper restrictions, began as early as the month of November to deliberate on the matter; and after some consideration determined to continue the prohibition of the malt distillery till the twenty-fourth day of December in the year 1760, unless such continuation should be abridged by any other act to be passed in the present session.

A bill for preventing the excessive use of spirituous liquors, by laying additional duties thereon; for shortening the prohibition for making low wines and spirits from wheat; for encouraging the exportation of British made spirits, and preventing the fraudulent relanding or importation thereof, also acquired the royal sanction.

They also, for a time limited, the act of the last session, permitting the importation of salted beef from Ireland. This permission was accordingly extended to the twenty-fourth day of December, in the year 1761. It were to be wished indeed that a free trade between Great Britain and Ireland could be allowed always to subsist with equal advantage to both kingdoms, but though this be impossible, it ought certainly to be granted, whenever the price of provisions in England are carried to an immoderate height.

As several lieutenants of counties had, for various reasons, suspended all proceedings in the execution of the laws relating to the militia for limited times; which suspensions were deemed inconsistent with the intent of the legislature, a bill was now brought in to enable his majesty's lieutenants of the several counties of England and Wales to proceed in the execution of the militia laws, notwithstanding any adjournments.

It was enacted, that as the speedy execution of the laws for regulating the militia was most essentially necessary at this juncture to the peace and security of the kingdom, every lieutenant of the place where such suspension had happened, should within one month after the passing of this act, proceed as if there had been no such suspension, and summon a meeting for the same purpose once in every succeeding month, until a sufficient number of officers, qualified and willing to serve, should be found, or until the expiration of the act for the better ordering of the militia forces.

The institution of the militia, though certainly laudable and necessary, was attended with so many unforeseen difficulties, that every session of parliament, since it was first established, has produced new acts for its better regulation. In April leave was given to prepare a bill for limiting, confining, and better regulating the payment of the weekly allowances made by act of parliament, for the maintenance of families unable to support themselves during the absence of militia men embodied and ordered into actual service; as well as for amending and improving the establishment of the militia, and lessening the number of officers entitled to pay, within that part of Great Britain called England.

While this bill was under consideration, the house received a petition from the mayor, aldermen, town-clerk, sheriffs, gentlemen, merchants, clergy, tradesmen, and others, inhabitants of the ancient city of Lincoln, importing, That by an act passed relating to the militia, it was provided, that when any militia men should be ordered out into actual service, leaving families unable to support themselves during their absence, the overseers of the parish where such families reside should allow them such weekly support as should be prescribed by any one justice of the peace; which allowance should be reimbursed out of the county stock. They represented, that a considerable number of men, inhabitants of the said city, had entered themselves to serve in the militia of the county of Lincoln, as volunteers, for several parishes and persons; yet their families were, nevertheless, supported by the county stock of the city of Lincoln. They took notice of the bill under deliberation, and prayed, that if it should pass into a law, they might have such relief in the premises, as to the house should seem proper. Regard was had to this petition in the amendments to the bill, which passed through both houses, and received the royal assent by commission.

By this law it was enacted, that if any militia man, who shall have been accepted and enrolled as a substitute, hired man, or volunteer, before the passing of the act, or who shall have been chosen by lot, whether before or after the passing of the act, shall, when embodied, or called out into actual service, and ordered to march, leave a family unable to support themselves, the overseers shall, by order of some one justice of the peace, pay, out of the poor's rates of such parish, a weekly allowance to such family, according to the usual and ordinary price of labour and husbandry there, viz. for one child under the age of ten years, the price of one day's labour; for two children under the age aforesaid, the price of two days labour; for three or four children under the age aforesaid, the price of three days labour; for five or more children under the age aforesaid, the price of four days labour; and for the wife of such militia man, the price of one day's labour; but that the families of such men only as shall be chosen by lot, and of the substitutes, hired men, and volunteers, already accepted and enrolled, shall, after the passing of this act, receive any such weekly allowance. For removing the grievance complained of in the above petition, it is enacted, that where treasurers shall reimburse to overseers any money, in pursuance of this act, on account of the weekly allowance to the family of any militia man, serving in the militia of any county or place, other than that wherein such family shall dwell, they are to transmit an account thereof, signed by some justice, for the place where such family shall dwell, to the treasurer of the county, &c. in the militia whereof such militia man shall serve, who is thereupon to pay him the sums so reimbursed to such overseers, and the same to be allowed in his accounts.

During the dependence of this bill, another was brought in to explain so much of the militia act passed in the thirty-first year of his majesty's reign, as related to the money to be given to private militia men, upon their being ordered out into actual service. By this law it was enacted, that the guinea which, by the former act was due to every private man of every regiment or company of militia, when ordered out into actual service, should be paid to every man that shall afterwards be inrolled into such regiment or company whilst in actual service: that no man should be intitled to his cloaths for his own use, until he should have served three years, if unembodied, or one year if embodied, after the delivery of the cloaths: and that the full pay of the militia should commence from the date of his majesty's warrant for drawing them out.

The next law I shall mention was intended to be one of the most important that ever fell under the cognizance of the legislature: it was a law that affected the freedom, dignity, and independency of parliaments. By an act passed in the ninth year of the reign of queen Anne, it was provided, that no person should be chosen a member of parliament who did not possess, in England or Wales, an estate, freehold or copyhold, for life, according to the following qualifications: for every knight of a shire, six hundred pounds per annum, over and above what will satisfy all incumbrances; and three hundred pounds per annum for every citizen, burgess, and baron of the cinque-port. It was also decreed, that the return of any person not thus qualified should be void; and that every candidate should, at the reasonable request of any other candidate at the time of election, or by two or more persons who had a right to vote, take an oath prescribed to establish his qualifications. This restraint was by no means effectual. So many oaths of different kinds had of late been prescribed, that they began to lose their due influence on the minds of men; and in particular, political perjury grew so common, that it was no longer considered as a crime. Subterfuges were discovered, by means of which this law relating to the qualification of candidates was effectually eluded. Those who were not actually possessed of such estates procured temporary conveyances from their friends and patrons, on condition of their being restored and cancelled after the election. By this scandalous fraud, the intention of the legislature was frustrated; the dignity of parliament prostituted; the example of perjury and corruption extended; the morals of the people depraved; and the constitution exposed to the most imminent danger.

In order to remedy these alarming evils, a few gentlemen, warmed with the real love of their country, presented a bill to the house, importing, that every person who shall be elected a member of the house of commons, should, before he presumed to take his seat, deliver to the clerk of the house at the table, while the commons are sitting, and the speaker in the chair, a paper or schedule signed by himself, containing a rental or particular of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereby he makes out his qualification, specifying the nature of his estate, whether messuage, land, rent, tythe, or what else; and if such estate consists of messuages, lands, or tythes, then specifying in whose occupation they are; and if in rent, then specifying the names of the owners or possessors of the lands and tenements out of which such rent is issuing; and also specifying the parish, township, or precinct and county, in which the said estate lies, and the value thereof; and every such person shall, at the same time also, take and subscribe the following oath, to be fairly written at the bottom of the paper or schedule: I, A. B. do swear, that the above is a true rental; and that I truly, and bona fide, have such an estate in law or equity, to and for my own use and benefit, of and in the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, above described, over and above what will satisfy and clear all incumbrances that may affect the same; and that such estate hath not been granted or made over to me fraudulently, on purpose to qualify me to be a member of this house. So help me God.

It was provided that the said paper or schedule, with the oath aforesaid, should be carefully kept by the clerk, to be inspected by the members of the house of commons, without fee or reward: that if any person elected to serve in any future parliament, should presume to sit or vote as a member of the house of commons, before he has delivered in such a paper or schedule, and taken the oath aforesaid, or should not be qualified according to the true intent or meaning of this act, his election should be void; and every person so sitting and voting should forfeit a certain sum, to be recovered by such person as should sue for the same by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information, whereon no essoin, privilege, protection, or wager of law, should be allowed, and only one imparlance: that if any person should have delivered in, and sworn to his qualification as aforesaid, and taken his seat in the house of commons; yet at any time after should, during the continuance of such parliament, sell, dispose of, alien, or any other ways encumber the estate, or any part thereof comprized in the schedule, so as to lessen or reduce the same under the value of the qualification by law directed; every such person, under a certain penalty, must deliver in a new or further qualification, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, and swear to the same, in manner before directed, before he shall again presume to sit or vote as a member of the house of commons: that in case any action, suit, or information, shall be brought, in pursuance of this act, against any member of the house of commons, the clerk of the house shall, upon demand, forthwith deliver a true and attested copy of the paper or schedule so delivered in to him as aforesaid by such member, to the plaintiff or prosecutor, or his attorney or agent, paying a certain sum for the same; which being proved a true copy, shall be admitted to be given in evidence upon the trial of any issue, in any such action. Provided always, that nothing contained in this act shall extend to the eldest son or heir-apparent of any peer or lord of parliament, or of any person qualified to serve as knight of the shire, or to the members for either of the universities, in that part of Great Britain called England, or to the members for that part of Great Britain called Scotland.

Such was the substance of the bill, as originally presented to the house of commons; but it was altered and amended in such a manner as will perhaps render it in a great measure ineffectual. It ran thus:

Clause 1. "Whereas by an act passed in the ninth year of the reign of her late majesty queen Anne, intituled, "An act for securing the freedom of parliaments, by the further qualifying the members to sit in the house of commons," it was enacted, That no person should be capable to sit or vote as a member of the house of commons, for any county, city, borough, or cinque-port, within that part of Great Britain called England, the dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, who should not have an estate, freehold or copyhold, for his own life, or for some greater estate, either in law or equity, to and for his own use and benefit, of or in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, over and above what will clear all incumbrances that might affect the same, lying or being within that part of Great Britain called England, the dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, of the respective annual value therein limited, viz. the annual value of six hundred pounds above reprises for every knight of a shire, and the annual value of three hundred pounds above reprises for every citizen, burgess, or baron of the cinque-ports.

2. "Now, in order to enforce and render the said act more effectual, be it enacted, by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That, from and after the determination of this present parliament, every person, except as is herein after excepted, who shall be elected a member of the house of commons, shall, before he presumes to vote in the house of commons, or sit there during any debate in the said house of commons, after their speaker is chosen, produce and deliver in to the clerk of the said house, at the table in the middle of the said house, and whilst the house of commons is there duly sitting, with their speaker in the chair of the said house, a paper or account, signed by every such member, containing the name or names of the parish, township, or precinct, or of the several parishes, townships, or precincts, and also of the county, or of the several counties in which the lands, tenements, or hereditaments do lie, whereby he makes out his qualification, declaring the same to be of the annual value of six hundred pounds above reprises, if a knight of a shire; and of the annual value of three hundred pounds above reprises, if a citizen, burgess, or baron of the cinque-ports; and shall also at the same time take and subscribe the following oath, viz.

"I A. B. do swear, that I truly and bona fide have such an estate, in law or equity, and of such value, to and for my own use and benefit, of or in the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, over and above what will satisfy and clear all incumbrances that may affect the same, as doth qualify me to be elected and returned to serve as a member for the place I am returned for, according to the tenor and good meaning of the acts of parliament in that behalf; and that such lands, tenements, or hereditaments do lie, as described in the paper or account signed by me, and now delivered to the clerk of the house of commons. So help me God.

"And the said house of commons is hereby impowered and required to administer the said oath and subscription according to the directions of this act, as occasion shall be, from time to time, to every person duly demanding the same, immediately after such person shall have taken the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, at the said table; and the said oaths and subscription, herein before directed to be taken and made, shall be entered into a parchment roll, to be provided for that purpose by the clerk of the house of commons; and the said papers or accounts so signed and delivered in to the said clerk as aforesaid, shall be filed and carefully kept by him.

3. "And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, That if any person who shall be elected to serve in any future parliament, as knight of a shire, or as a citizen, burgess, or baron of the cinque-port, shall presume to sit or vote, as aforesaid, as a member of the house of commons, before he has delivered in such paper or account, and taken and subscribed such oath, as aforesaid; or shall not be qualified according to the true intent and meaning of the said recited act, and of this act, his election shall be, and is hereby declared to be, void, and a new writ shall be issued to elect another member in the said person's room.

4. "Provided always, that nothing in this act contained shall extend to the eldest son or heir-apparent of any peer or lord of parliament, or of any person qualified to serve as knight of a shire, or

or to the members for either of the universities, in that part of Great Britain called England, or to the members of that part of Great Britain called Scotland."

The house having examined an account of the produce of the fund established for paying annuities granted in the year 1759, with the charge on that fund, on the fifth day of January in the succeeding year, it appeared that there had been a considerable deficiency in the said fund on the fifth day of July preceding; and this had been made good out of the sinking fund, by a resolution of the seventh of February, which we have already specified. They therefore instructed the committee of ways and means, to consider so much of the annuity and lottery act passed in the preceding session as related to the three per cent. annuities, amounting to the sum of seven millions five hundred and ninety thousand pounds, granted in the year 1759; and also to consider so much of the said act as related to the subsidy of poundage upon certain goods and merchandizes to be imported into this kingdom, and the additional inland duty on coffee and chocolate.

The committee having taken these points into deliberation, agreed to the two resolutions we have already mentioned, with respect to the consolidation; and a bill was brought in for adding those annuities granted in the year 1759, to the joint stock of three per cent. annuities, consolidated by the acts of the twenty-fifth, twenty eighth, twenty-ninth, and thirty second year of his majesty's reign; and for several duties therein mentioned, to the sinking fund. The committee was afterwards empowered to insert a clause for cancelling such lottery tickets as were made forth in an act passed in the thirtieth year of his majesty's reign, and were not then disposed of; a clause for this purpose was accordingly added to the bill, which passed through both houses without opposition, and received the royal assent at the end of the session.

Towards the end of April admiral Townshend presented a bill for the more effectual securing the payment of such prize and bounty monies as were appropriated to the use of Greenwich hospital, by an act passed in the twenty-ninth year of his majesty's reign. As by that law no time was limited, or particular method prescribed for giving notifications of the day appointed for the payment of the shares of the prizes and bounty-money; and as many agents had neglected to specify in the notification given in the London Gazette, for payment of shares of prizes condemned in the courts of admiralty in Great Britain, the particular day or time when such payments were to commence, whereby it was rendered difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain the time when the hospital at Greenwich became intitled to the unclaimed shares; of consequence could not enjoy the full benefit of the act. The bill now prepared imported, that from and after the first day of September, in the present year, all notifications of the payment of the shares of prizes taken by any of his majesty's ships of war, and condemned in Great Britain, and from and after the first day of February, in the year 1761, all notifications of the payment of the shares of prizes taken and condemned in any other of his majesty's dominions in Europe, or in any of the British plantations in America; and from and after the twenty-fifth day of December, in the year 1761, all notifications of the payment of the shares of prizes taken and condemned in any other of his majesty's dominions, shall be respectively given and published in the following manner: If the prize be condemned in any court of admiralty in Great Britain, such notification, under the agent's hand, shall be published in the London Gazette; and if condemned in any court of admiralty, in any other of his majesty's dominions, such notifications shall be published in like manner in the Gazette, or other news-paper of public authority, of the island or place where the prize is condemned; and if there shall be no Gazette or such news-paper published there, then in some one of the public news-papers of the place; and such agents shall deliver to the collector, customer, or searcher, or his lawful deputy; and if there shall be no such office, then to the principal officer or officers of the place where the prize is condemned, or to the lawful deputy of such principal officer, two of the Gazettes or other news-papers in which such notifications are inserted; and if there shall not be any public news-papers in any such island or place, the agent shall give two such notifications in writing, under his hand; and every such collector or other officer as aforesaid, shall subscribe his name on both the said Gazettes, news-papers, or written notifications, and by the first ship which shall sail from thence to any port of Great Britain, shall transmit to the treasurer or deputy treasurers of the said royal hospital, one of the said notifications with his name so subscribed, to be there registered, and shall faithfully preserve and keep the other, with his name thereon subscribed, in his own custody; and in every notification as aforesaid, the agent shall specify his place of abode, and the precise day of the month and year appointed for the payment of the respective shares to the captors; and all notifications with respect to prizes condemned in Great Britain shall be published in the London Gazette, three days at least before any share of such prizes shall be paid; and with respect to prizes condemned in any other part of his majesty's dominions, such notification shall be delivered to the said collector or other officers aforesaid, three days at least before any share of such prizes shall be paid. It was likewise enacted, that the agents of the distribution of bounty bills should insert, and publish under their hands, in the London Gazette, three days at least before payment, public notifications of the day and year appointed for such payment, and also insert therein their respective places of abode.

A committee having been appointed to enquire into the original standards of weights and measures in the kingdom of England, to consider the laws relating thereto, and to report their observations thereupon, together with their opinion of the most effectual means for ascertaining and enforcing uniform and certain standards of weights and measures, the prepared copies, models, patterns, and multiples, and presented them to the house: then they were locked up by the clerk of the house; and the lord Carystort presented a bill, according to order, for enforcing uniformity of weights and measures to the standards by law to be established: but this measure, which had been so long in dependence,

These and a good number of other bills of less importance, both private and public, were passed into laws by commission, on the twenty-second day of May, when the lord-keeper of the great seal closed the session with a speech to both houses. He declared in his majesty's name, that the king looked back on their proceedings with entire satisfaction: that the duty and affection which they had expressed for the king's person and government, the zeal and unanimity they had shewed in maintaining the true interest of their country, could only be equalled by what his majesty had formerly experienced from this parliament: that it would have given his majesty the most sensible pleasure, had he been able to assure them that his endeavours to promote a general peace, had met with more suitable returns: that his majesty, in conjunction with his good brother and ally the king of Prussia, had chosen to give their enemies proof of this equitable disposition, in the midst of a series of glorious victories; an opportunity the most proper to take such a step with dignity, and to manifest to all Europe the purity and moderation of his views: that after such a conduct, the king had the comfort to reflect, that the further continuance of the calamities of war could not be imputed to him or his allies: that he trusted in the blessing of heaven, upon the justice of his arms, and upon those ample means which the zeal of the parliament, in so good a cause, had wisely put into his hands, that his future successes in carrying on the war would not fall short of the past; and that, in the event, the public tranquillity would be restored on solid and durable foundations: that his majesty had taken the most effectual care to augment the combined army in Germany; and at the same time to keep up such a force at home as might frustrate any attempts of the enemy to invade these kingdoms; such attempts as had hitherto ended only in their own confusion: that the royal navy was never in a more flourishing and respectable condition; and the signal victory obtained last winter over the French fleet, on their own coasts, had given lustre to his majesty's arms, fresh spirit to his maritime forces, and reduced the naval strength of France to a very low ebb: that his majesty had disposed his squadrons in such a manner as might best conduce to the annoyance of his enemies; to the defence of his own dominions, both in Europe and America; to the preserving and pursuing his conquests, as well as to the protection of the trade of his subjects, which he had extremely at heart: that nothing could relieve his majesty's royal mind, under the anxiety he felt for the burthens of his faithful subjects, but the public-spirited cheerfulness with which the commons had granted him such large supplies, and his conviction that they were necessary for the security and essential interests of his kingdoms: he therefore returned them his hearty thanks for these supplies, and assured them they should be duly applied to the purposes for which they had been given. Finally, he recommended to both houses the continuance of that union and good harmony which he had observed with so much pleasure, and from which they had derived such important advantages. He desired they would study to promote these desirable objects, to support the king's government, and the good order of their respective countries, and consult their own real happiness and prosperity.

The advances towards an accommodation which had been made in the preceding year by the kings of England and Prussia, in their manifesto published at the Hague by prince Lewis of Brunswic, seemed to be regarded by neutral powers as a certain proof of their pacific disposition. We have already seen that the king of Spain offered his best offices in quality of mediator. When a congress was proposed, the States-general made an offer of Breda, as a place proper for the negotiation. The king of Great Britain, by the mouth of his ambassador, thanked their High Mightinesses for the sincere desire they expressed to put an end to the ravages of war, which had extended desolation over the face of Europe; he readily closed with their gracious offer, and, in consequence of his high regard and invariable friendship for their High Mightinesses, wished earnestly that it might be acceptable to the other powers at war. The French king returned an answer nearly of the same import. His ambassador declared, That his most Christian majesty was highly sensible of the offer they had made of Breda for the holding the congress; that, in order to give a fresh proof of his sincere desire to encrease the good harmony that subsisted between him and the States-general, he accepted their offer with pleasure: but as he could take no step without the concurrence of his high allies, he was obliged to wait for their answer, which could not fail to be favourable, if nothing remained to be settled but the place for holding the congress.

King Stanislaus having written a letter to his Britannic majesty, offering the city of Nancy for the same purpose, he received a civil answer, expressing the king of England's sense of his obliging offer, which however he declined, as a place not conveniently situated for all the powers interested in the great work of pacification. Civilities of the same nature likewise passed between the sovereign of Lorraine and the king of Prussia. As the proposals for a peace made by the king of England and his allies might have left an unfavourable impression of their adversaries, had they been flatly rejected, the court of Vienna was prevailed upon to concur with her allies in a declaration, professing their pacific sentiments; which declaration was delivered on the third day of April, by the Austrian minister residing at the Hague, to his serene highness prince Lewis of Brunswic; and a paper of the same nature was also delivered to him separately by the French and Russian ministers. These professions, however, did not interrupt the military operations.

Though the French army under the marshal duke de Broglie remained in cantonment in the neighbourhood of Friedberg, and prince Ferdinand had retired from Corfдорff to Marburg, where, in the beginning of January, he fixed his head quarters, yet was not the winter altogether inactive. As far back as the twenty-fifth day of December, the duke de Broglie, having called in his detachments, attempted to surprise the allied army by a forced march to Klein-linnes; but finding that his scheme or to the members of that part of Great Britain. The members of that part of Great Britain.

On the very day the Highlanders, under major Luckner, who commanded the whole detachment, attacked the village of Dillemburg, where Beaufremont's regiment of dragoons was posted on the side of Dillemburg, and routed them with great slaughter. The greater part of the regiment was killed, and many prisoners were taken, together with two hundred horses, and all their baggage. The Highlanders distinguished themselves on this occasion by their impetuosity, which was the more remarkable, as they were no other than raw recruits just arrived from their own country, and altogether unacquainted with discipline. On the eighth day of January Mr. de St. Germain advanced on the left of the allies, with the grenadiers of the French army, supported by eight battalions and a body of dragoons: but he was opposed by the duke of Holstein, at the head of a strong detachment in the neighbourhood of Erfdorff, who, by dint of a furious cannonade, compelled him to retreat with precipitation.

After this attempt the French parties were recalled, and their army retired into winter quarters in and about Franckfort on the Maine; while prince Ferdinand quartered the allies at Cassel, Paderborn, Munster, and Osnabrug, this last place being allotted to the British troops, as being the nearest to Embden, where the reinforcements from Britain were to be landed. In the beginning of February the hereditary prince of Brunswic, with the detachment of the allied army under his command, began his march from Chemnitz in Saxony for Westphalia, where he safely arrived, after having assisted at a long conference in Hamelen, with his father the reigning duke, his uncle prince Ferdinand, and some principal members of the regency of Hanover.

The French general continued to detach strong parties to beat up the quarters of the allies, and lay their towns under contribution. In the beginning of March the marquis de Blaisel advanced at the head of two thousand four hundred men from Giesfen, where he commanded, to Marburg, forced the gates of the town, and constrained the garrison of the allies to take shelter in the castle. As he could not pretend to undertake the siege of the fortress, by the fire of which he was exceedingly galled, he demanded of the town a contribution of one hundred thousand florins, and carried some of the magistrates along with him as hostages for the payment of this imposition. He afterwards appeared at Hombourg, Alsfeldt, and Hartzberg, the frontier posts of the allies; but did not think proper to attack either, because he perceived he would meet with an obstinate resistance.

The French have long laid claim to the character of the most polite and civilized nation in Europe; notwithstanding which, they are sometimes found as brutal and rapacious as the most barbarous enemy. On pretence of taking umbrage at the town of Hanau Muntzenberg, for having, without their permission, acknowledged the regency of the landgraviate of Hesse Cassel, they, in the month of February, ordered the magistrates of that place to pay, within the term of twenty-four hours, the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand livres, on pain of being subjected to military execution. This order was signified by the prince de Robecq, to whom the magistrates represented the impossibility of raising such a sum, as the country was totally exhausted, and their credit absolutely destroyed, in consequence of their inability to pay the interest of the capitals negotiated in the course of the preceding year. He still insisting upon finding the money before night, they offered to pay eighty thousand florins, which they raised with the utmost difficulty, and begged the payment of the rest might be postponed for a few weeks; but their request was rejected with disdain. The garrison was reinforced by two battalions, and four squadrons dispersed in the principal squares and markets in the city, and the gates were shut. They even planted cannon in the street, and tarred matches were fixed to many houses, in order to intimidate the inhabitants. These expedients proving ineffectual, detachments of grenadiers entered the houses of the principal magistrates and merchants, from whence they removed all their best effects to the town-hall, where they were kept in deposit, until they were redeemed with all the money that could possibly be raised. This exaction, so little consistent with the character of a civilized nation, the French minister declared to the diet at Ratisbon was agreeable to the instructions of his most Christian majesty.

By way of retaliation for the cruelty practised at Hanau, a detachment of the allied army under general Luckner was sent to raise contributions in Fulda, and actually carried off hostages from that city; but retired before a strong body of the enemy, who took possession of the place. From hence the French marched, in their turn, to plunder the town of Hirschfeldt and Vacha. Accordingly they appeared at Vacha, situated on the frontiers of Hesse, and forming the head of the chain of cantonments which the allies had on the Werra. This place was attacked with such vigour that colonel Freytag, who commanded the post, was obliged to abandon the town; but he maintained himself on a rising ground in the neighbourhood, where he amused the enemy, until two battalions of grenadiers came to his assistance. Thus reinforced, he repulsed the French, pursued them them for three leagues, and drove them with a considerable loss from Gissa, where they had resolved to fix their quarters. These skirmishes happened in the beginning of May, when the grand armies were just in motion to begin the campaign.

By this time the forces under the mareschal duke de Broglie were augmented to one hundred thousand; while the count de St. Germain commanded a separate army on the Rhine, consisting of thirty thousand men, assembled from the quarters of Dusseldorp, Cologne, Cleves, and Wesel. This second corps was intended to divide the allied army, which, by such a division, would be considerably weakened; and the French court threatened to form a third army, under the prince de Soubise; but this was never assembled. The duke de Broglie was in such favour with the French ministry at this juncture, that he was promoted over the heads of many old generals, who now demanded and obtained their dismissal; and every step was taken to render the campaign glorious to this spirited commander: but, notwithstanding all their care, and his own activity, he found it impossible to take the field early enough in the spring, from want of forage for his cavalry. While his quarters were established at Frankfort, his troops were plentifully supplied with all sorts of provision from the Upper Rhine; but this convenience depended upon his being master of the course of the river: nor could he move from this position without forfeiting the advantage, and providing magazines for the use of his forces; so that he was obliged to lie inactive until he could have the benefit of green forage in his march.

The same inconveniencies lay more heavy on prince Ferdinand, who, being in an exhausted country, was obliged to fall back as far as Paderborn, and draw his supplies from Hamburgh and Bremen on the Elbe and the Weser. By this time, however, he had received a reinforcement of British troops from Embden, under the command of major-general Griffin; and before the end of the campaign the forces of that nation in Germany were augmented to five and twenty thousand. The allied army marched from their cantonments on the fifth day of May, and proceeded by the way of Paderborn to Fritzlar, where, on the twentieth, they encamped; but part of the troops left in the bishopric of Munster, under general Sporcken, were ordered to form a camp at Dulmen, to make head against the French corps commanded by the count de St. Germain.

General Imhoff was sent with a detachment to Kirchayn on the Orme; and general Gilsoe, with another corps, advanced to the neighbourhood of Hirschfeld on the Fulda. The former of these having ordered colonel Luckner to scour the country with a body of hussars, that officer, on the twenty-fourth day of May, fell in with a French patrol, which gave the alarm at Butzbach, when the garrison of that place, amounting to five hundred picquets, under general Waldener, fled with great precipitation. Being, however, pursued and overtaken near a wood, they were routed and dispersed. Colonel Luckner, entering Butzbach, found a considerable quantity of forage, flour, wine, and equipage, belonging to the fugitives. What he could not carry off, he distributed among the poor inhabitants, and returned to general Imhoff's camp at Ameneburg, with above an hundred prisoners. This excursion alarmed the enemy to such a degree, that their whole army was put in motion; and the duke de Broglie, in person, advanced with a large body of troops as far as Friedberg: but understanding the allies had not quitted their camp at Fritzlar, he returned to Frankfort, after having cantoned that part of his army in the Wetteraw.

This alarm was not so mortifying as the secession of the Wirtemberg troops, amounting to ten thousand men, commanded by their duke in person, who left the French army in disgust, and returned to his own country. The Imperial army, under the prince de Deuxponts, quartered at Bamberg, began their march to Naumburg on the twentieth of May; but one of their detachments of cavalry having received a check from a body of Prussians near Lutzen, they fell back; and on the fourth day of June encamped at Lichtenfels upon the Maine. The small detachments of the grand armies, as well as those belonging to the bodies commanded by general Sporcken and the count de St. Germain in the neighbourhood of Dusseldorp, skirmished with various success. The hereditary prince of Brunswic being detached from the allied army, with some battalions of grenadiers and two regiments of English dragoons, advanced to the county of Fulda, where he was joined by the troops under general Gilsoe, and performed some inconsiderable exploits, particularly at Hofenfeldt and Zielbach, where he surprised and took divers parties of the enemy.

By the twenty-fourth of June prince Ferdinand, quitting his camp at Fritzlar, advanced to Frillendorf, and took post on the hills between Ziegenheim and Freysa, general Imhoff commanding at a small distance on the right, and the hereditary prince, now returned from Fulda, being stationed on the left of the army. In the mean time, the duke de Broglie, assembling his forces between Merlau and Laubach, advanced to Neustadt, where he encamped on the twenty-eighth day of the month, and at the same time occupied a strong post at Wassenburg. His intention was to penetrate through the country of Hesse into Hanover, and make himself entirely master of that electorate. With this view he resolved to effect a junction with the count de St. Germain, whom he ordered to advance towards Brilau and Corbach; while he himself decamped from Neustadt on the eighth day of July, advanced by the way of Frankenberg. Prince Ferdinand, having received intelligence that the count de St. Germain was in motion, began his march from Ziegenheim, and on the ninth day of July reached the heights of Brunau, in the neighbourhood of Wildungen.

The hereditary prince, at the head of the advanced corps, reinforced with some battalions and squadrons under major-general Griffin, was sent forwards to Saxenhausen, whither the army followed the next morning. The hereditary prince, continuing to advance, found the enemy already formed at Corbach; but supposing their whole force did not exceed ten thousand infantry and seventeen squadrons, and being impelled by the ardour of his own courage, he resolved to give them battle. He accordingly attacked them about two in the afternoon, and the action became very warm had been previously discovered, nothing but a cannonade ensued, and he retreated to his former quarters. On the twenty-ninth colonel Luckner, at the head of the Hanoverian hunters, fell in with a detachment of the enemy, consisting of four hundred men, under the command of count Muret. These he attacked with such fury, that the count was made prisoner, and all his party either killed or taken, except two and twenty who escaped. On the third day of January the marquis de Vogue attacked the town of Herborn, which he carried, and took a small detachment of the allies who were there posted. At the same time the marquis Dauvet surprized the town of Dillemburg, the garrison of the allied troops being obliged to retire into the castle, where they were closely besieged. Prince Ferdinand was no sooner informed of their situation than he began his march with a strong detachment for their relief, on the seventh day of the month, when he attacked and totally defeated the besiegers, took seven hundred prisoners, including forty officers, with seven pair of colours and two pieces of cannon.

On that very day the Highlanders, under major Keith, supported by the hussars of Luckner, who commanded the whole detachment, attacked the village of Eybach, where Beaufremont's regiment of dragoons was posted on the side of Dillemburg, and routed them with great slaughter. The greater part of the regiment was killed, and many prisoners were taken, together with two hundred horses, and all their baggage. The Highlanders distinguished themselves on this occasion by their intrepidity, which was the more remarkable, as they were no other than raw recruits just arrived from their own country, and altogether unacquainted with discipline. On the eighth day of January Mr. de St. Germain advanced on the left of the allies, with the grenadiers of the French army, sustained by eight battalions and a body of dragoons: but he was opposed by the duke of Holstein, at the head of a strong detachment in the neighbourhood of Erzdorff, who, by dint of a furious cannonade, compelled him to retreat with precipitation.

After this attempt the French parties were recalled, and their army retired into winter quarters in and about Franckfort on the Maine; while prince Ferdinand quartered the allies at Cassel, Paderborn, Munster, and Osnabrug, this last place being allotted to the British troops, as being the nearest to Embden, where the reinforcements from Britain were to be landed. In the beginning of February the hereditary prince of Brunswic, with the detachment of the allied army under his command, began his march from Chemnitz in Saxony for Westphalia, where he safely arrived, after having assisted at a long conference in Hamelen, with his father the reigning duke, his uncle prince Ferdinand, and some principal members of the regency of Hanover.

The French general continued to detach strong parties to beat up the quarters of the allies, and lay their towns under contribution. In the beginning of March the marquis de Blaisel advanced at the head of two thousand four hundred men from Gießen, where he commanded, to Marburg, forced the gates of the town, and constrained the garrison of the allies to take shelter in the castle. As he could not pretend to undertake the siege of the fortress, by the fire of which he was exceedingly galled, he demanded of the town a contribution of one hundred thousand florins, and carried some of the magistrates along with him as hostages for the payment of this imposition. He afterwards appeared at Hombourg, Alsfeldt, and Hartzberg, the frontier posts of the allies; but did not think proper to attack either, because he perceived he would meet with an obstinate resistance.

The French have long laid claim to the character of the most polite and civilized nation in Europe; notwithstanding which, they are sometimes found as brutal and rapacious as the most barbarous enemy. On pretence of taking umbrage at the town of Hanau Muntzenberg, for having, without their permission, acknowledged the regency of the landgraviate of Hesse Cassel, they, in the month of February, ordered the magistrates of that place to pay, within the term of twenty-four hours, the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand livres, on pain of being subjected to military execution. This order was signified by the prince de Robecq, to whom the magistrates represented the impossibility of raising such a sum, as the country was totally exhausted, and their credit absolutely destroyed, in consequence of their inability to pay the interest of the capitals negociated in the course of the preceding year. He still insisting upon finding the money before night, they offered to pay eighty thousand florins, which they raised with the utmost difficulty, and begged the payment of the rest might be postponed for a few weeks; but their request was rejected with disdain. The garrison was reinforced by two battalions, and four squadrons dispersed in the principal squares and markets in the city, and the gates were shut. They even planted cannon in the street, and tarred matches were fixed to many houses, in order to intimidate the inhabitants. These expedients proving ineffectual, detachments of grenadiers entered the houses of the principal magistrates and merchants, from whence they removed all their best effects to the town-hall, where they were kept in deposit, until they were redeemed with all the money that could possibly be raised. This exaction, so little consistent with the character of a civilized nation, the French minister declared to the diet at Ratisbon was agreeable to the instructions of his most Christian majesty.

By way of retaliation for the cruelty practised at Hanau, a detachment of the allied army under general Luckner was sent to raise contributions in Fulda, and actually carried off hostages from that city; but retired before a strong body of the enemy, who took possession of the place. From hence the French marched, in their turn, to plunder the town of Hirschfeldt and Vacha. Accordingly they appeared at Vacha, situated on the frontiers of Hesse, and forming the head of the chain of cantonments which the allies had on the Werra. This place was attacked with such vigour that colonel Freytag, who commanded the post, was obliged to abandon the town; but he maintained himself on a rising ground in the neighbourhood, where he amused the enemy, until two battalions of grenadiers came to his assistance. Thus reinforced, he repulsed the French, pursued them them for three leagues, and drove them with a considerable loss from Giffa, where they had resolved to fix their quarters. These skirmishes happened in the beginning of May, when the grand armies were just in motion to begin the campaign.

By this time the forces under the marechal duke de Broglie were augmented to one hundred thousand; while the count de St. Germain commanded a separate army on the Rhine, consisting of thirty thousand men, assembled from the quarters of Dusseldorp, Cologne, Cleves, and Wesel. This second corps was intended to divide the allied army, which, by such a division, would be considerably weakened; and the French court threatened to form a third army, under the prince de Soubise; but this was never assembled. The duke de Broglie was in such favour with the French ministry at this juncture, that he was promoted over the heads of many old generals, who now demanded and obtained their dismissal; and every step was taken to render the campaign glorious to this spirited commander: but, notwithstanding all their care, and his own activity, he found it impossible to take the field early enough in the spring, from want of forage for his cavalry. While his quarters were established at Frankfort, his troops were plentifully supplied with all sorts of provision from the Upper Rhine; but this convenience depended upon his being master of the course of the river: nor could he move from this position without forfeiting the advantage, and providing magazines for the use of his forces; so that he was obliged to lie inactive until he could have the benefit of green forage in his march.

The same inconveniencies lay more heavy on prince Ferdinand, who, being in an exhausted country, was obliged to fall back as far as Paderborn, and draw his supplies from Hamburgh and Bremen on the Elbe and the Weser. By this time, however, he had received a reinforcement of British troops from Embden, under the command of major-general Griffin; and before the end of the campaign the forces of that nation in Germany were augmented to five and twenty thousand. The allied army marched from their cantonments on the fifth day of May, and proceeded by the way of Paderborn to Fritzlar, where, on the twentieth, they encamped; but part of the troops left in the bishopric of Munster, under general Sporcken, were ordered to form a camp at Dulmen, to make head against the French corps commanded by the count de St. Germain.

General Imhoff was sent with a detachment to Kirchayn on the Orme; and general Gilfoe, with another corps, advanced to the neighbourhood of Hirschfeld on the Fulda. The former of these having ordered colonel Luckner to scour the country with a body of hussars, that officer, on the twenty-fourth day of May, fell in with a French patrol, which gave the alarm at Butzbach, when the garrison of that place, amounting to five hundred picquets, under general Waldener, fled with great precipitation. Being, however, pursued and overtaken near a wood, they were routed and dispersed. Colonel Luckner, entering Butzbach, found a considerable quantity of forage, flour, wine, and equipage, belonging to the fugitives. What he could not carry off, he distributed among the poor inhabitants, and returned to general Imhoff's camp at Ameneburg, with above an hundred prisoners. This excursion alarmed the enemy to such a degree, that their whole army was put in motion; and the duke de Broglie, in person, advanced with a large body of troops as far as Friedberg: but understanding the allies had not quitted their camp at Fritzlar, he returned to Frankfort, after having cantoned that part of his army in the Wetteraw.

This alarm was not so mortifying as the secession of the Wirtemberg troops, amounting to ten thousand men, commanded by their duke in person, who left the French army in disgust, and returned to his own country. The Imperial army, under the prince de Deuxponts, quartered at Bamberg, began their march to Naumberg on the twentieth of May; but one of their detachments of cavalry having received a check from a body of Prussians near Lutzen, they fell back; and on the fourth day of June encamped at Lichtenfels upon the Maine. The small detachments of the grand armies, as well as those belonging to the bodies commanded by general Sporcken and the count de St. Germain in the neighbourhood of Dusseldorp, skirmished with various success. The hereditary prince of Brunswic being detached from the allied army, with some battalions of grenadiers and two regiments of English dragoons, advanced to the county of Fulda, where he was joined by the troops under general Gilfoe, and performed some inconsiderable exploits, particularly at Hofenfeldt and Zielbach, where he surprised and took divers parties of the enemy.

By the twenty-fourth of June prince Ferdinand, quitting his camp at Fritzlar, advanced to Frillendorf, and took post on the hills between Ziegenheim and Freysa, general Imhoff commanding at a small distance on the right, and the hereditary prince, now returned from Fulda, being stationed on the left of the army. In the mean time, the duke de Broglie, assembling his forces between Merlau and Laubach, advanced to Neustadt, where he encamped on the twenty-eighth day of the month, and at the same time occupied a strong post at Wassemburg. His intention was to penetrate through the country of Hesse into Hanover, and make himself entirely master of that electorate. With this view he resolved to effect a junction with the count de St. Germain, whom he ordered to advance towards Brilau and Corbach; while he himself decamped from Neustadt on the eighth day of July, advanced by the way of Frankenberg. Prince Ferdinand, having received intelligence that the count de St. Germain was in motion, began his march from Ziegenheim, and on the ninth day of July reached the heights of Brunau, in the neighbourhood of Wildungen.

The hereditary prince of Brunswic being detached from the allied army, with some battalions of grenadiers and two regiments of English dragoons, advanced to the county of Fulda, where he was joined by the troops under general Gilsoe, and performed some inconsiderable exploits, particularly at Hofenfeldt and Zielbach, where he surprised and took divers parties of the enemy.

By the twenty-fourth of June prince Ferdinand, quitting his camp at Fritzlar, advanced to Frillendorf, and took post on the hills between Ziegenheim and Freysa, general Imhoff commanding at a small distance on the right, and the hereditary prince, now returned from Fulda, being stationed on the left of the army. In the mean time, the duke de Broglie, assembling his forces between Merlau and Laubach, advanced to Neustadt, where he encamped on the twenty-eighth day of the month, and at the same time occupied a strong post at Wassemburg. His intention was to penetrate through the country of Hesse into Hanover, and make himself entirely master of that electorate. With this view he resolved to effect a junction with the count de St. Germain, whom he ordered to advance towards Brilau and Corbach; while he himself decamped from Neustadt on the eighth day of July, advanced by the way of Frankenberg. Prince Ferdinand, having received intelligence that the count de St. Germain was in motion, began his march from Ziegenheim, and on the ninth day of July reached the heights of Brunau, in the neighbourhood of Wildungen.

The hereditary prince, at the head of the advanced corps, reinforced with some battalions and squadrons under major-general Griffin, was sent forwards to Saxenhausen, whither the army followed the next morning. The hereditary prince, continuing to advance, found the enemy already formed at Corbach; but supposing their whole force did not exceed ten thousand infantry and seventeen squadrons, and being impelled by the ardour of his own courage, he resolved to give them battle. He accordingly attacked them about two in the afternoon, and the action became very warm dinary expences of the land forces, and other services not provided for by parliament, comprehending the pensions for the widows of reduced officers, they allotted the sum of nine hundred fifty-five thousand three hundred and forty-four pounds fifteen shillings and five-pence halfpenny. They voted one million to empower his majesty to discharge the like sum, raised in pursuance of an act made in the last session of parliament, and charged upon the first aids or supplies to be granted in this session of parliament. They gave six hundred and seventy thousand pounds for enabling his majesty to make good his engagements with the king of Prussia, pursuant to a new convention between him and that monarch, concluded on the ninth day of November in the present year. Fifteen thousand pounds they allowed, upon account, towards enabling the principal officers of his majesty's ordnance to defray the necessary charges and expences of taking down and removing the present magazine for gun-powder, situated in the neighbourhood of Greenwich, and of erecting it in some less dangerous situation. Sixty thousand pounds they gave to enable his majesty to fulfil his engagements with the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, pursuant to the separate article of a treaty between the two powers, renewed in the month of November; the sum to be paid as his most Serene Highness should think it most convenient, in order to facilitate the means by which the landgrave might again fix his residence in his own dominions, and by his presence give fresh courage to his faithful subjects. Five hundred thousand pounds they voted, upon account, as a present supply towards defraying the charges of forage, bread, bread waggons, train of artillery, wood, straw, provisions, and contingencies of his majesty's combined army under the command of prince Ferdinand. To the Foundling hospital they granted five thousand pounds; and fifteen thousand for improving, widening, and enlarging the passage over and through London-bridge. To replace divers sums taken from the sinking fund, they granted two hundred twenty-five thousand two hundred and eighty-one pounds nineteen shillings and four-pence. For the subsistence of reduced officers, including the allowances to the several officers and private men of the two troops of horse-guards and regiment of horse reduced, and to the superannuated gentlemen of the four troops of horse-guards, they voted thirty-eight thousand five hundred and ninety-seven pounds nine shillings. Upon account, for the support of the colonies of Nova Scotia and Georgia, they granted twenty-one thousand six hundred twenty-four pounds two shillings and two-pence. For enabling the king to give a proper compensation to the provinces in North America, for the expences they might incur in levying and maintaining troops, according as the vigour and activity of those respective provinces should be thought by his majesty to merit, they advanced the sum of two hundred thousand pounds. The East India company they gratified with twenty thousand pounds towards enabling them to defray the expence of a military force in their settlements, in lieu of a battalion of the king's troops now returned to Ireland. Twenty-five thousand pounds were provided for the payment of the out-pensioners of Chelsea-hospital. For subsequent augmentations of the British forces, since the first estimate of guards and garrisons for the ensuing year was presented, they allowed one hundred thirty-four thousand one hundred thirty-nine pounds seventeen shillings and four-pence. They further voted, upon account, towards enabling the governors and guardians of the Foundling-hospital to maintain, educate, and bind apprentice, the children admitted into the said charity, the sum of forty-seven thousand two hundred and eighty-five pounds. For defraying the expence of maintaining the militia in South and North Britain, to the twenty-fourth day of December of the ensuing year, they voted an additional grant of two hundred ninety thousand eight hundred and twenty-six pounds sixteen shillings and eight-pence; and, moreover, they granted fourscore thousand pounds, upon account, towards defraying the charge of pay and cloathing of the unembodied militia for the year, ending on the twenty-fifth day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-one. For reimbursing the colony of New-York their expences in furnishing provisions and stores to the troops raised by them for his majesty's service, in the campaign of the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, they allowed two thousand nine hundred and seventy-seven pounds seven shillings and eight-pence; and for maintaining the British forts and settlements on the coast of Africa, they renewed the grant of ten thousand pounds. For the maintenance and augmentation of the troops of Brunswic, in the pay of Great Britain, for the ensuing year, pursuant to an ulterior convention concluded and signed at Paderborn on the fifth day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty, they granted the sum of ninety thousand seven hundred and sixty-nine pounds eight shillings and eleven-pence farthing; and for the troops of Hesse Cassel in the same pay, during the same period, they allotted one hundred and one thousand ninety-six pounds three shillings and two pence. For the extraordinary expences of the land forces, and other services incurred, from the twenty-fourth day of December following, and not provided for, they granted the sum of four hundred and twenty thousand one hundred and twenty pounds one shilling. To make good the deficiency of the grants for the service of this present year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine, they assigned the sum of seventy-five thousand one hundred and seventy pounds three-pence farthing. For printing the Journals of the House of Commons they gave five thousand pounds; and six hundred thirty-four pounds thirteen shillings and seven-pence as interest, at the rate of four per cent. per annum, from the twenty-fifth day of August in the present year to the same day of April next, for the sum of twenty-three thousand eight hundred pounds eleven shillings and eleven-pence remaining in the office of ordnance, and not paid into the hands of the deputy of the king's remembrancer of the court of Exchequer, as directed by an act made in the last session of parliament, to make compensation for lands and hereditaments purchased for his majesty's service at Chatham, Portsmouth, and Plymouth, by reason of doubts and difficulties which had arisen touching the execution of the said act. For defraying the extraordinary charge of the mint, during the present year, they allowed eleven thousand nine hundred and

and forty pounds thirteen shillings and ten-pence; and two thousand five hundred pounds, upon account, for paying the debts claimed and sustained upon a forfeited estate in North Britain. They likewise allowed twelve thousand eight hundred and seventy-four pounds fifteen shillings and ten-pence, for defraying the charge of a regiment of light dragoons, and of an additional company to the corps commanded by lieutenant-colonel Vaughan. Finally, they voted one million, upon account, to enable the king to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred or to be incurred for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty; and to take all such measures as might be necessary to defeat any enterprize or designs of his enemies, as the exigency of affairs might require.

In a word, the sum total granted in this session of parliament amounted to fifteen millions five hundred three thousand five hundred and sixty-three pounds fifteen shillings and nine-pence halfpenny; a sum which, however immense, and even seemingly enormous, was no more than was absolutely necessary for carrying on the war with that spirit and vigour with which it had hitherto been prosecuted.

The funds established for raising this sum consisted of the following particulars. The land-tax at four shillings in the pound, and the malt-tax, were continued, as the standing revenue of Great Britain. The committee resolved that the sum of eight millions should be raised by transferable annuities, after the rate of four pounds per centum: that an additional capital of three pounds should be added to every hundred pounds advanced, to consist of a lottery ticket valued at ten pounds, to be attended also with transferable annuities, after the rate of four per cent. per annum, to commence from the fifth day of January, in the year 1761, to continue for twenty years, and then be reduced to three pounds per cent. per annum: and that the said sum of eight millions should bear the same interest of four per cent. commencing on the same day, to continue for twenty-one years, and then be reduced to three pounds per centum: that the said annuities should be transferable at the bank of England, and be redeemable by parliament, in the whole or in part, by sums not less than five hundred thousand pounds at one time, after the expiration of twenty-one years, and not sooner, six months notice having been given of such payments respectively: that every subscriber should, on or before the fifteenth day of January next, make a deposit of fifteen pounds per cent. on such sums as he should chuse to subscribe towards raising the eight millions, with the cashiers of the bank of England, as a security for his making the future payments, which were fixed in the following manner; ten per cent. on or before the twenty-sixth day of February next; ten per cent. on or before the twenty-fifth day of March next; ten per cent. on or before the twenty-ninth day of April next; the same proportion on the last day of May, the third day of July, the fourteenth day of August, the sixteenth day of September, and the twenty-ninth day of October; which several sums so received should, by the said cashiers, be paid into the receipt of the Exchequer, to be applied, from time to time, to such services as should then have been voted by the houses in this session of parliament, and not otherwise: that such of the proprietors of tallies and orders made out at the Exchequer, by virtue of an act passed in the last session of parliament, for enabling the king to raise the sum of one million, for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, as should be desirous of subscribing a sum equal to the principal sum contained in such respective orders; and should, on or before the eighth day of January, produce the said orders, and signify such their desire to the said cashiers, should be admitted subscribers for such sums: that any tallies or orders made out at the Exchequer, by virtue of the said act, should be received by the said cashiers as cash, to the amount of the respective sums contained in such tallies or orders, and the interest that should be due thereupon, as well in making the said deposit, as in all subsequent payments: that the tallies and orders so received, should be taken at the receipt of the Exchequer, and allowed in the payments to be made by the cashiers, for the amount of such principal sums and interest: and that every subscriber who should pay in the whole of this subscription, on or before the sixteenth day of September, should be allowed a discount, after the rate of three pounds per cent. per annum, from the day such subscription should be so completed, to the twenty-ninth day of October.

The committee further resolved, that an additional tax of three-pence should be paid for every bushel of malt made in England and Wales, and three halfpence for every bushel made in Scotland; and so proportionably for any greater or less quantity, to be paid by the makers thereof: that three halfpence should be paid for every bushel of malt conveyed from Scotland to England and Wales: and that the afore-mentioned annuities and lottery should be charged upon the said duties on malt, for which the sinking fund should be a collateral security. With regard to the same imposition they resolved, that this new duty should, both in England and Scotland, be paid for every bushel of malt, whether ground or unground, which, having been made before the commencement of these additional duties, should, on or after the said day of commencement, be in the possession of any maltster, or maker of malt, for sale, seller, or retailer of malt, brewer, distiller, inn-keeper, victualler, vinegar-maker, or any person or persons in trust for them, or for their use: that the monies arising by the said duties should be carried to, and made part of the fund for the payment of the annuities and lottery, allowing the sum of eight millions granted to his majesty in the present session of parliament.

They determined that a stamp duty of ten shillings should be charged on every piece of vellum or parchment, or sheet of paper, on which any licence for making and selling measures of capacity should be engrossed, written, or printed, as well as upon every piece of vellum or paper on which a licence, for making and selling weights, should be written or printed. They resolved, that a new duty of five-pence should be charged upon every gallon of low wines or spirits, of the first extraction, made or drawn from any sort of liquor or wash brewed of malt or corn, or from brewers wash or tilts, over and above all other duties charged or chargeable thereon, to be paid by the distillers distillers or makers thereof: that for every gallon of strong waters, or aqua vitæ, made for sale, of the materials aforesaid, one shilling and three-pence, over and above all other duties charged and chargeable thereon, should be paid by the distillers or makers thereof; and that the same duty should be exacted of the distillers or makers, for every gallon of low wines or spirits of the first extraction, made or drawn from any foreign or imported materials, or any mixture therewith, over and above all other duties: that a new duty of eight-pence per gallon should be imposed upon spirits drawn in Great Britain from any foreign or imported materials, or any mixture therewith: that six-pence three farthings, over and above all other duties chargeable thereon, should be paid for every gallon of low wines, or spirits of the first extraction, made or drawn from cyder, or any sort of British materials, except those before mentioned, or any mixture therewith; and that the distillers and makers should pay one shilling one penny three farthings for every gallon of spirits made for sale from cyder, or any other British materials, except those already mentioned, over and above all other duties chargeable in the same article: that, in order to encourage the exportation of spirits drawn or made in Great Britain, the like drawbacks and allowances should be made, under proper regulations, upon the exportation of rectified spirits made or drawn in Great Britain, as are now payable upon the exportation of home-made raw spirits; and that, as a further encouragement, an additional drawback or allowance of twenty-four pounds ten shillings per ton should be paid, upon the exportation of all such spirits: that an additional duty of one shilling for every gallon of single brandy, spirits, or aqua vitæ, imported from beyond seas; and of two shillings for every gallon of such spirits above proof, commonly called double brandy, so imported, should be paid by the importer; and that these additional duties should stand appropriated and be applied to the same uses and purposes, respectively, to which the present duties on spirituous liquors are now applied and appropriated.

The committee resolved, that the three pound per cent. annuities, amounting to six millions six hundred thousand pounds, together with the additional capital of fifteen pounds added to every hundred pounds advanced towards the said sum, amounting to nine hundred and ninety thousand pounds, granted in the last session, should be, with the consent of the several proprietors, made part of the joint stock of three pounds per cent. annuities, transferable at the bank of England, consolidated by the acts in the twenty-fifth, twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth, and thirty-second of his present majesty's reign; and the charges and expences in respect thereof, be charged upon and paid out of the sinking fund, until redemption thereof by parliament, in the same and like manner as the annuities consolidated as aforesaid are paid and payable; and that such persons as should not, on or before the twentieth day of June ensuing, signify their dissent, in books to be opened at the bank of England for that purpose, should be deemed assenting thereto: that all monies arising from the fifth day of January next, or that may afterwards arise from the produce of the subsidy of poundage upon certain goods and merchandizes imported or to be imported into the kingdom; and the additional inland duty on coffee and chocolate, which were made a fund for payment of three pounds per cent. per annum, at the bank of England, on six millions six hundred thousand pounds, by virtue of an act towards the supply of this year, 1759; as also the additional capital of fifteen pounds added to every hundred advanced towards the said sum, amounting to nine hundred and ninety thousand pounds, should be made part of the sinking fund: that all duties charged upon rum or spirits of the growth, produce, and manufacture of his majesty's sugar plantations, imported into Great Britain, should be drawn back upon the re-exportation; and that an additional drawback or allowance of three pounds three shillings per ton should be paid upon the exportation of spirits drawn in Great Britain from molasses, over and above all other drawbacks and allowances payable thereon.

They resolved to continue in force several acts and clauses relating to the jurisdiction, powers, and authorities vested in commissioners for licensing hackney chairs and coaches; and agreed, that the act for making sail-cloth, now near expiring, should be protracted. They resolved, that for raising the sum of one million, granted to his majesty towards discharging the debt of the navy, and also the sum of five hundred thousand pounds, should be raised by loans, or Exchequer bills, to be charged upon the first aids to be granted in the next session of parliament; and such Exchequer bills, if not discharged, with interest, on or before the twenty-fifth day of March, in the year 1761, to be exchanged and received in payment, in such manner as Exchequer bills have usually been exchanged and received: that the sum of two millions six hundred two thousand seven hundred and six pounds nine shillings and nine-pence, should be issued and applied out of such monies as should or might arise from the surplus, excess, or overplus monies, and other revenues composing the sinking fund: and that the sum of one million should be raised by loans, or Exchequer bills, to be charged on the first aids to be granted in the next session of parliament.

The whole provision made by the committee of ways and means, amounted to sixteen millions one hundred thirty thousand five hundred and sixty-one pounds nine shillings and eight-pence, exceeding the grant for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty, in the sum of six hundred twenty-six thousand nine hundred and ninety-seven pounds thirteen shillings and ten-pence halfpenny. This excess, however, will not appear extraordinary, when we consider that it was destined to make good the premium of two hundred and forty thousand pounds to the subscribers upon the eight million loan, as well as the deficiencies in the other grants, which never fail to make a considerable article in the supply of every session.

It will not be necessary to enumerate all the acts that were founded upon the resolutions touching the supply. It may be proper, however, to observe, that in the act for the land-tax, and in the act for the malt-tax, there was a clause of credit, empowering the commissioners of the Treasury to raise the money, which they produced by loans of

Exchequer bills, bearing an interest of four per cent. per annum, that is, one per cent. higher than the interest usually granted in time of peace. While the house of commons deliberated on the bill for granting to his majesty several duties upon malt, and for raising a certain sum of money to be charged on the said duties, a petition was presented by the maltsters of Ipswich and parts adjacent, against an additional duty on the stock of malt in hand: but no regard was paid to this remonstrance, and the bill, with several new amendments, passed through both houses, under the title of "An act for granting to his majesty several duties upon malt, and for raising the sum of eight millions by way of annuities and a lottery, to be charged on the said duties; and to prevent the fraudulent obtaining of allowances in the gauging of corn making into malt; and for making four duplicates of Exchequer bills, tickets, certificates, receipts, annuity orders, and other orders lost, burned, or otherwise destroyed."

The other three bills, that turned wholly on the supply, were passed in common course, without the least opposition in either house, and received the royal assent by commission at the end of the session. The first of these, intitled, A bill for enabling his majesty to raise a certain sum of money for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, contained a clause of appropriation, added to it by instruction; and the bank was enabled to lend the million, which the commissioners of the Treasury were empowered by the act to borrow, at the interest of four pounds per cent. The second, granting to his majesty a certain sum of money out of the sinking fund for the service of the year 1760, comprehended a clause of credit for borrowing the money thereby granted; and another clause empowering the bank to lend it without any limitation of interest. And the third, enabling his majesty to raise a certain sum of money towards discharging the debt of the navy, and for naval services during the ensuing year, enacted, that the Exchequer bills thereby to be issued, should not be received, or pass to any receiver or collector of the public revenue, or at the receipt of the Exchequer, before the twenty-sixth day of March in the year 1761.

As the act of the preceding session, prohibiting the malt distillery, was to expire at Christmas, the commons, thinking it necessary to consider of effectual methods for laying this branch of business under proper restrictions, began as early as the month of November to deliberate on the matter; and after some consideration determined to continue the prohibition of the malt distillery till the twenty-fourth day of December in the year 1760, unless such continuation should be abridged by any other act to be passed in the present session.

A bill for preventing the excessive use of spirituous liquors, by laying additional duties thereon; for shortening the prohibition for making low wines and spirits from wheat; for encouraging the exportation of British made spirits, and preventing the fraudulent relanding or importation thereof, also acquired the royal sanction.

They also, for a time limited, the act of the last session, permitting the importation of salted beef from Ireland. This permission was accordingly extended to the twenty-fourth day of December, in the year 1761. It were to be wished indeed that a free trade between Great Britain and Ireland could be allowed always to subsist with equal advantage to both kingdoms, but though this be impossible, it ought certainly to be granted, whenever the price of provisions in England are carried to an immoderate height.

As several lieutenants of counties had, for various reasons, suspended all proceedings in the execution of the laws relating to the militia for limited times; which suspensions were deemed inconsistent with the intent of the legislature, a bill was now brought in to enable his majesty's lieutenants of the several counties of England and Wales to proceed in the execution of the militia laws, notwithstanding any adjournments.

It was enacted, that as the speedy execution of the laws for regulating the militia was most essentially necessary at this juncture to the peace and security of the kingdom, every lieutenant of the place where such suspension had happened, should within one month after the passing of this act, proceed as if there had been no such suspension, and summon a meeting for the same purpose once in every succeeding month, until a sufficient number of officers, qualified and willing to serve, should be found, or until the expiration of the act for the better ordering of the militia forces.

The institution of the militia, though certainly laudable and necessary, was attended with so many unforeseen difficulties, that every session of parliament, since it was first established, has produced new acts for its better regulation. In April leave was given to prepare a bill for limiting, confining, and better regulating the payment of the weekly allowances made by act of parliament, for the maintenance of families unable to support themselves during the absence of militia men embodied and ordered into actual service; as well as for amending and improving the establishment of the militia, and lessening the number of officers entitled to pay, within that part of Great Britain called England.

While this bill was under consideration, the house received a petition from the mayor, aldermen, town-clerk, sheriffs, gentlemen, merchants, clergy, tradesmen, and others, inhabitants of the ancient city of Lincoln, importing, That by an act passed relating to the militia, it was provided, that when any militia men should be ordered out into actual service, leaving families unable to support themselves during their absence, the overseers of the parish where such families reside should allow them such weekly support as should be prescribed by any one justice of the peace; which allowance should be reimbursed out of the county stock. They represented, that a considerable number of men, inhabitants of the said city, had entered themselves to serve in the militia of the county of Lincoln, as volunteers, for several parishes and persons; yet their families were, nevertheless, supported by the county stock of the city of Lincoln. They took notice of the bill under deliberation, and prayed, that if it should pass into a law, they might have such relief in the premises, as to the house should seem proper. Regard was had to this petition in the amendments to the bill, which passed through both houses, and received the royal assent by commission.

By this law it was enacted, that if any militia man, who shall have been accepted and enrolled as a substitute, hired man, or volunteer, before the passing of the act, or who shall have been chosen by lot, whether before or after the passing of the act, shall, when embodied, or called out into actual service, and ordered to march, leave a family unable to support themselves, the overseers shall, by order of some one justice of the peace, pay, out of the poor's rates of such parish, a weekly allowance to such family, according to the usual and ordinary price of labour and husbandry there, viz. for one child under the age of ten years, the price of one day's labour; for two children under the age aforesaid, the price of two days labour; for three or four children under the age aforesaid, the price of three days labour; for five or more children under the age aforesaid, the price of four days labour; and for the wife of such militia man, the price of one day's labour; but that the families of such men only as shall be chosen by lot, and of the substitutes, hired men, and volunteers, already accepted and enrolled, shall, after the passing of this act, receive any such weekly allowance. For removing the grievance complained of in the above petition, it is enacted, that where treasurers shall reimburse to overseers any money, in pursuance of this act, on account of the weekly allowance to the family of any militia man, serving in the militia of any county or place, other than that wherein such family shall dwell, they are to transmit an account thereof, signed by some justice, for the place where such family shall dwell, to the treasurer of the county, &c. in the militia whereof such militia man shall serve, who is thereupon to pay him the sums so reimbursed to such overseers, and the same to be allowed in his accounts.

During the dependence of this bill, another was brought in to explain so much of the militia act passed in the thirty-first year of his majesty's reign, as related to the money to be given to private militia men, upon their being ordered out into actual service. By this law it was enacted, that the guinea which, by the former act was due to every private man of every regiment or company of militia, when ordered out into actual service, should be paid to every man that shall afterwards be enrolled into such regiment or company whilst in actual service: that no man should be intitled to his cloaths for his own use, until he should have served three years, if unembodied, or one year if embodied, after the delivery of the cloaths: and that the full pay of the militia should commence from the date of his majesty's warrant for drawing them out.

The next law I shall mention was intended to be one of the most important that ever fell under the cognizance of the legislature: it was a law that affected the freedom, dignity, and independency of parliaments. By an act passed in the ninth year of the reign of queen Anne, it was provided, that no person should be chosen a member of parliament who did not possess, in England or Wales, an estate, freehold or copyhold, for life, according to the following qualifications: for every knight of a shire, six hundred pounds per annum, over and above what will satisfy all incumbrances; and three hundred pounds per annum for every citizen, burgess, and baron of the cinque-port. It was also decreed, that the return of any person not thus qualified should be void; and that every candidate should, at the reasonable request of any other candidate at the time of election, or by two or more persons who had a right to vote, take an oath prescribed to establish his qualifications. This restraint was by no means effectual. So many oaths of different kinds had of late been prescribed, that they began to lose their due influence on the minds of men; and in particular, political perjury grew so common, that it was no longer considered as a crime. Subterfuges were discovered, by means of which this law relating to the qualification of candidates was effectually eluded. Those who were not actually possessed of such estates procured temporary conveyances from their friends and patrons, on condition of their being restored and cancelled after the election. By this scandalous fraud, the intention of the legislature was frustrated; the dignity of parliament prostituted; the example of perjury and corruption extended; the morals of the people depraved; and the constitution exposed to the most imminent danger.

In order to remedy these alarming evils, a few gentlemen, warmed with the real love of their country, presented a bill to the house, importing, that every person who shall be elected a member of the house of commons, should, before he presumed to take his seat, deliver to the clerk of the house at the table, while the commons are sitting, and the speaker in the chair, a paper or schedule signed by himself, containing a rental or particular of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereby he makes out his qualification, specifying the nature of his estate, whether messuage, land, rent, tythe, or what else; and if such estate consists of messuages, lands, or tythes, then specifying in whose occupation they are; and if in rent, then specifying the names of the owners or possessors of the lands and tenements out of which such rent is issuing; and also specifying the parish, township, or precinct and county, in which the said estate lies, and the value thereof; and every such person shall, at the same time also, take and subscribe the following oath, to be fairly written at the bottom of the paper or schedule: I, A. B. do swear, that the above is a true rental; and that I truly, and bona fide, have such an estate in law or equity, to and for my own use and benefit, of and in the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, above described, over and above what will satisfy and clear all incumbrances that may affect the same; and that such estate hath not been granted or made over to me fraudulently, on purpose to qualify me to be a member of this house. So help me God.

It was provided that the said paper or schedule, with the oath aforesaid, should be carefully kept by the clerk, to be inspected by the members of the house of commons, without fee or reward: that if any person elected to serve in any future parliament, should presume to sit or vote as a member of the house of commons, before he has delivered in such a paper or schedule, and taken the oath aforesaid, or should not be qualified according to the true intent or meaning of this act, his election should be void; and every person so sitting and voting should forfeit a certain sum, to be

be recovered by such person as should sue for the same by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information, whereon no essoin, privilege, protection, or wager of law, should be allowed, and only one imparlance: that if any person should have delivered in, and sworn to his qualification as aforesaid, and taken his seat in the house of commons; yet at any time after should, during the continuance of such parliament, sell, dispose of, alien, or any other ways encumber the estate, or any part thereof comprized in the schedule, so as to lessen or reduce the same under the value of the qualification by law directed; every such person, under a certain penalty, must deliver in a new or further qualification, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, and swear to the same, in manner before directed, before he shall again presume to sit or vote as a member of the house of commons: that in case any action, suit, or information, shall be brought, in pursuance of this act, against any member of the house of commons, the clerk of the house shall, upon demand, forthwith deliver a true and attested copy of the paper or schedule so delivered in to him as aforesaid by such member, to the plaintiff or prosecutor, or his attorney or agent, paying a certain sum for the same; which being proved a true copy, shall be admitted to be given in evidence upon the trial of any issue, in any such action. Provided always, that nothing contained in this act shall extend to the eldest son or heir-apparent of any peer or lord of parliament, or of any person qualified to serve as knight of the shire, or to the members for either of the universities, in that part of Great Britain called England, or to the members for that part of Great Britain called Scotland.

Such was the substance of the bill, as originally presented to the house of commons; but it was altered and amended in such a manner as will perhaps render it in a great measure ineffectual. It ran thus:

Clause 1. "Whereas by an act passed in the ninth year of the reign of her late majesty queen Anne, intituled, "An act for securing the freedom of parliaments, by the further qualifying the members to sit in the house of commons," it was enacted, That no person should be capable to sit or vote as a member of the house of commons, for any county, city, borough, or cinque-port, within that part of Great Britain called England, the dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, who should not have an estate, freehold or copyhold, for his own life, or for some greater estate, either in law or equity, to and for his own use and benefit, of or in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, over and above what will clear all incumbrances that might affect the same, lying or being within that part of Great Britain called England, the dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, of the respective annual value therein limited, viz. the annual value of six hundred pounds above reprises for every knight of a shire, and the annual value of three hundred pounds above reprises for every citizen, burgess, or baron of the cinque-ports.

2. "Now, in order to enforce and render the said act more effectual, be it enacted, by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That, from and after the determination of this present parliament, every person, except as is herein after excepted, who shall be elected a member of the house of commons, shall, before he presumes to vote in the house of commons, or sit there during any debate in the said house of commons, after their speaker is chosen, produce and deliver in to the clerk of the said house, at the table in the middle of the said house, and whilst the house of commons is there duly sitting, with their speaker in the chair of the said house, a paper or account, signed by every such member, containing the name or names of the parish, township, or precinct, or of the several parishes, townships, or precincts, and also of the county, or of the several counties in which the lands, tenements, or hereditaments do lie, whereby he makes out his qualification, declaring the same to be of the annual value of six hundred pounds above reprises, if a knight of a shire; and of the annual value of three hundred pounds above reprises, if a citizen, burgess, or baron of the cinque-ports; and shall also at the same time take and subscribe the following oath, viz.

"I A. B. do swear, that I truly and bona fide have such an estate, in law or equity, and of such value, to and for my own use and benefit, of or in the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, over and above what will satisfy and clear all incumbrances that may affect the same, as doth qualify me to be elected and returned to serve as a member for the place I am returned for, according to the tenor and good meaning of the acts of parliament in that behalf; and that such lands, tenements, or hereditaments do lie, as described in the paper or account signed by me, and now delivered to the clerk of the house of commons. So help me God.

"And the said house of commons is hereby impowered and required to administer the said oath and subscription according to the directions of this act, as occasion shall be, from time to time, to every person duly demanding the same, immediately after such person shall have taken the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, at the said table; and the said oaths and subscription, herein before directed to be taken and made, shall be entered into a parchment roll, to be provided for that purpose by the clerk of the house of commons; and the said papers or accounts so signed and delivered in to the said clerk as aforesaid, shall be filed and carefully kept by him.

3. "And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, That if any person who shall be elected to serve in any future parliament, as knight of a shire, or as a citizen, burgess, or baron of the cinque-port, shall presume to sit or vote, as aforesaid, as a member of the house of commons, before he has delivered in such paper or account, and taken and subscribed such oath, as aforesaid; or shall not be qualified according to the true intent and meaning of the said recited act, and of this act, his election shall be, and is hereby declared to be, void, and a new writ shall be issued to elect another member in the said person's room.

4. "Provided always, that nothing in this act contained shall extend to the eldest son or heir-apparent of any peer or lord of parliament, or of any person qualified to serve as knight of a shire, or

or to the members for either of the universities, in that part of Great Britain called England, or to the members of that part of Great Britain called Scotland."

The house having examined an account of the produce of the fund established for paying annuities granted in the year 1759, with the charge on that fund, on the fifth day of January in the succeeding year, it appeared that there had been a considerable deficiency in the said fund on the fifth day of July preceding; and this had been made good out of the sinking fund, by a resolution of the seventh of February, which we have already specified. They therefore instructed the committee of ways and means, to consider so much of the annuity and lottery act passed in the preceding session as related to the three per cent. annuities, amounting to the sum of seven millions five hundred and ninety thousand pounds, granted in the year 1759; and also to consider so much of the said act as related to the subsidy of poundage upon certain goods and merchandizes to be imported into this kingdom, and the additional inland duty on coffee and chocolate.

The committee having taken these points into deliberation, agreed to the two resolutions we have already mentioned, with respect to the consolidation; and a bill was brought in for adding those annuities granted in the year 1759, to the joint stock of three per cent. annuities, consolidated by the acts of the twenty-fifth, twenty eighth, twenty-ninth, and thirty second year of his majesty's reign; and for several duties therein mentioned, to the sinking fund. The committee was afterwards empowered to insert a clause for cancelling such lottery tickets as were made forth in an act passed in the thirtieth year of his majesty's reign, and were not then disposed of; a clause for this purpose was accordingly added to the bill, which passed through both houses without opposition, and received the royal assent at the end of the session.

Towards the end of April admiral Townshend presented a bill for the more effectual securing the payment of such prize and bounty monies as were appropriated to the use of Greenwich hospital, by an act passed in the twenty-ninth year of his majesty's reign. As by that law no time was limited, or particular method prescribed for giving notifications of the day appointed for the payment of the shares of the prizes and bounty-money; and as many agents had neglected to specify in the notification given in the London Gazette, for payment of shares of prizes condemned in the courts of admiralty in Great Britain, the particular day or time when such payments were to commence, whereby it was rendered difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain the time when the hospital at Greenwich became intitled to the unclaimed shares; of consequence could not enjoy the full benefit of the act. The bill now prepared imported, that from and after the first day of September, in the present year, all notifications of the payment of the shares of prizes taken by any of his majesty's ships of war, and condemned in Great Britain, and from and after the first day of February, in the year 1761, all notifications of the payment of the shares of prizes taken and condemned in any other of his majesty's dominions in Europe, or in any of the British plantations in America; and from and after the twenty-fifth day of December, in the year 1761, all notifications of the payment of the shares of prizes taken and condemned in any other of his majesty's dominions, shall be respectively given and published in the following manner: If the prize be condemned in any court of admiralty in Great Britain, such notification, under the agent's hand, shall be published in the London Gazette; and if condemned in any court of admiralty, in any other of his majesty's dominions, such notifications shall be published in like manner in the Gazette, or other news-paper of public authority, of the island or place where the prize is condemned; and if there shall be no Gazette or such news-paper published there, then in some one of the public news-papers of the place; and such agents shall deliver to the collector, customer, or searcher, or his lawful deputy; and if there shall be no such office, then to the principal officer or officers of the place where the prize is condemned, or to the lawful deputy of such principal officer, two of the Gazettes or other news-papers in which such notifications are inserted; and if there shall not be any public news-papers in any such island or place, the agent shall give two such notifications in writing, under his hand; and every such collector or other officer as aforesaid, shall subscribe his name on both the said Gazettes, news-papers, or written notifications, and by the first ship which shall sail from thence to any port of Great Britain, shall transmit to the treasurer or deputy treasurers of the said royal hospital, one of the said notifications with his name so subscribed, to be there registered, and shall faithfully preserve and keep the other, with his name thereon subscribed, in his own custody; and in every notification as aforesaid, the agent shall specify his place of abode, and the precise day of the month and year appointed for the payment of the respective shares to the captors; and all notifications with respect to prizes condemned in Great Britain shall be published in the London Gazette, three days at least before any share of such prizes shall be paid; and with respect to prizes condemned in any other part of his majesty's dominions, such notification shall be delivered to the said collector or other officers aforesaid, three days at least before any share of such prizes shall be paid. It was likewise enacted, that the agents of the distribution of bounty bills should insert, and publish under their hands, in the London Gazette, three days at least before payment, public notifications of the day and year appointed for such payment, and also insert therein their respective places of abode.

A committee having been appointed to enquire into the original standards of weights and measures in the kingdom of England, to consider the laws relating thereto, and to report their observations thereupon, together with their opinion of the most effectual means for ascertaining and enforcing uniform and certain standards of weights and measures, the prepared copies, models, patterns, and multiples, and presented them to the house: then they were locked up by the clerk of the house; and the lord Carystort presented a bill, according to order, for enforcing uniformity of weights and measures to the standards by law to be established: but this measure, which had been so long in dependence,

These and a good number of other bills of less importance, both private and public, were passed into laws by commission, on the twenty-second day of May, when the lord-keeper of the great seal closed the session with a speech to both houses. He declared in his majesty's name, that the king looked back on their proceedings with entire satisfaction: that the duty and affection which they had expressed for the king's person and government, the zeal and unanimity they had shewed in maintaining the true interest of their country, could only be equalled by what his majesty had formerly experienced from this parliament: that it would have given his majesty the most sensible pleasure, had he been able to assure them that his endeavours to promote a general peace, had met with more suitable returns: that his majesty, in conjunction with his good brother and ally the king of Prussia, had chosen to give their enemies proof of this equitable disposition, in the midst of a series of glorious victories; an opportunity the most proper to take such a step with dignity, and to manifest to all Europe the purity and moderation of his views: that after such a conduct, the king had the comfort to reflect, that the further continuance of the calamities of war could not be imputed to him or his allies: that he trusted in the blessing of heaven, upon the justice of his arms, and upon those ample means which the zeal of the parliament, in so good a cause, had wisely put into his hands, that his future successes in carrying on the war would not fall short of the past; and that, in the event, the public tranquillity would be restored on solid and durable foundations: that his majesty had taken the most effectual care to augment the combined army in Germany; and at the same time to keep up such a force at home as might frustrate any attempts of the enemy to invade these kingdoms; such attempts as had hitherto ended only in their own confusion: that the royal navy was never in a more flourishing and respectable condition; and the signal victory obtained last winter over the French fleet, on their own coasts, had given lustre to his majesty's arms, fresh spirit to his maritime forces, and reduced the naval strength of France to a very low ebb: that his majesty had disposed his squadrons in such a manner as might best conduce to the annoyance of his enemies; to the defence of his own dominions, both in Europe and America; to the preserving and pursuing his conquests, as well as to the protection of the trade of his subjects, which he had extremely at heart: that nothing could relieve his majesty's royal mind, under the anxiety he felt for the burthens of his faithful subjects, but the public-spirited cheerfulness with which the commons had granted him such large supplies, and his conviction that they were necessary for the security and essential interests of his kingdoms: he therefore returned them his hearty thanks for these supplies, and assured them they should be duly applied to the purposes for which they had been given. Finally, he recommended to both houses the continuance of that union and good harmony which he had observed with so much pleasure, and from which they had derived such important advantages. He desired they would study to promote these desirable objects, to support the king's government, and the good order of their respective countries, and consult their own real happiness and prosperity.

The advances towards an accommodation which had been made in the preceding year by the kings of England and Prussia, in their manifesto published at the Hague by prince Lewis of Brunswic, seemed to be regarded by neutral powers as a certain proof of their pacific disposition. We have already seen that the king of Spain offered his best offices in quality of mediator. When a congress was proposed, the States-general made an offer of Breda, as a place proper for the negociation. The king of Great Britain, by the mouth of his ambassador, thanked their High Mightinesses for the sincere desire they expressed to put an end to the ravages of war, which had extended desolation over the face of Europe; he readily closed with their gracious offer, and, in consequence of his high regard and invariable friendship for their High Mightinesses, wished earnestly that it might be acceptable to the other powers at war. The French king returned an answer nearly of the same import. His ambassador declared, That his most Christian majesty was highly sensible of the offer they had made of Breda for the holding the congress; that, in order to give a fresh proof of his sincere desire to encrease the good harmony that subsisted between him and the States-general, he accepted their offer with pleasure: but as he could take no step without the concurrence of his high allies, he was obliged to wait for their answer, which could not fail to be favourable, if nothing remained to be settled but the place for holding the congress.

King Stanislaus having written a letter to his Britannic majesty, offering the city of Nancy for the same purpose, he received a civil answer, expressing the king of England's sense of his obliging offer, which however he declined, as a place not conveniently situated for all the powers interested in the great work of pacification. Civilities of the same nature likewise passed between the sovereign of Lorraine and the king of Prussia. As the proposals for a peace made by the king of England and his allies might have left an unfavourable impression of their adversaries, had they been flatly rejected, the court of Vienna was prevailed upon to concur with her allies in a declaration, professing their pacific sentiments; which declaration was delivered on the third day of April, by the Austrian minister residing at the Hague, to his serene highness prince Lewis of Brunswic; and a paper of the same nature was also delivered to him separately by the French and Russian ministers. These professions, however, did not interrupt the military operations.

Though the French army under the marshal duke de Broglie remained in cantonment in the neighbourhood of Friedberg, and prince Ferdinand had retired from Corfsdorff to Marburg, where, in the beginning of January, he fixed his head quarters, yet was not the winter altogether inactive. As far back as the twenty-fifth day of December, the duke de Broglie, having called in his detachments, attempted to surprise the allied army by a forced march to Klein-linnes; but finding that his scheme had been previously discovered, nothing but a cannonade ensued, and he retreated to his former quarters. On the twenty-ninth colonel Luckner, at the head of the Hanoverian hunters, fell in with a detachment of the enemy, consisting of four hundred men, under the command of count Muret. These he attacked with such fury, that the count was made prisoner, and all his party either killed or taken, except two and twenty who escaped. On the third day of January the marquis de Vogue attacked the town of Herborn, which he carried, and took a small detachment of the allies who were there posted. At the same time the marquis Dauvet surprized the town of Dillemburg, the garrison of the allied troops being obliged to retire into the castle, where they were closely besieged. Prince Ferdinand was no sooner informed of their situation than he began his march with a strong detachment for their relief, on the seventh day of the month, when he attacked and totally defeated the besiegers, took seven hundred prisoners, including forty officers, with seven pair of colours and two pieces of cannon.

On that very day the Highlanders, under major Keith, supported by the hussars of Luckner, who commanded the whole detachment, attacked the village of Eybach, where Beaufremont's regiment of dragoons was posted on the side of Dillemburg, and routed them with great slaughter. The greater part of the regiment was killed, and many prisoners were taken, together with two hundred horses, and all their baggage. The Highlanders distinguished themselves on this occasion by their intrepidity, which was the more remarkable, as they were no other than raw recruits just arrived from their own country, and altogether unacquainted with discipline. On the eighth day of January Mr. de St. Germain advanced on the left of the allies, with the grenadiers of the French army, sustained by eight battalions and a body of dragoons: but he was opposed by the duke of Holstein, at the head of a strong detachment in the neighbourhood of Erfsdorff, who, by dint of a furious cannonade, compelled him to retreat with precipitation.

After this attempt the French parties were recalled, and their army retired into winter quarters in and about Franckfort on the Maine; while prince Ferdinand quartered the allies at Cassel, Paderborn, Munster, and Osnabrug, this last place being allotted to the British troops, as being the nearest to Embden, where the reinforcements from Britain were to be landed. In the beginning of February the hereditary prince of Brunswic, with the detachment of the allied army under his command, began his march from Chemnitz in Saxony for Westphalia, where he safely arrived, after having assisted at a long conference in Hamelen, with his father the reigning duke, his uncle prince Ferdinand, and some principal members of the regency of Hanover.

The French general continued to detach strong parties to beat up the quarters of the allies, and lay their towns under contribution. In the beginning of March the marquis de Blaisel advanced at the head of two thousand four hundred men from Giefesen, where he commanded, to Marburg, forced the gates of the town, and constrained the garrison of the allies to take shelter in the castle. As he could not pretend to undertake the siege of the fortress, by the fire of which he was exceedingly galled, he demanded of the town a contribution of one hundred thousand florins, and carried some of the magistrates along with him as hostages for the payment of this imposition. He afterwards appeared at Hombourg, Alsfeldt, and Hartzberg, the frontier posts of the allies; but did not think proper to attack either, because he perceived he would meet with an obstinate resistance.

The French have long laid claim to the character of the most polite and civilized nation in Europe; notwithstanding which, they are sometimes found as brutal and rapacious as the most barbarous enemy. On pretence of taking umbrage at the town of Hanau Muntzenberg, for having, without their permission, acknowledged the regency of the landgraviate of Hesse Cassel, they, in the month of February, ordered the magistrates of that place to pay, within the term of twenty-four hours, the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand livres, on pain of being subjected to military execution. This order was signified by the prince de Robecq, to whom the magistrates represented the impossibility of raising such a sum, as the country was totally exhausted, and their credit absolutely destroyed, in consequence of their inability to pay the interest of the capitals negociated in the course of the preceding year. He still insisting upon finding the money before night, they offered to pay eighty thousand florins, which they raised with the utmost difficulty, and begged the payment of the rest might be postponed for a few weeks; but their request was rejected with disdain. The garrison was reinforced by two battalions, and four squadrons dispersed in the principal squares and markets in the city, and the gates were shut. They even planted cannon in the street, and tarred matches were fixed to many houses, in order to intimidate the inhabitants. These expedients proving ineffectual, detachments of grenadiers entered the houses of the principal magistrates and merchants, from whence they removed all their best effects to the town-hall, where they were kept in deposit, until they were redeemed with all the money that could possibly be raised. This exaction, so little consistent with the character of a civilized nation, the French minister declared to the diet at Ratisbon was agreeable to the instructions of his most Christian majesty.

By way of retaliation for the cruelty practised at Hanau, a detachment of the allied army under general Luckner was sent to raise contributions in Fulda, and actually carried off hostages from that city; but retired before a strong body of the enemy, who took possession of the place. From hence the French marched, in their turn, to plunder the town of Hirschfeldt and Vacha. Accordingly they appeared at Vacha, situated on the frontiers of Hesse, and forming the head of the chain of cantonments which the allies had on the Werra. This place was attacked with such vigour that colonel Freytag, who commanded the post, was obliged to abandon the town; but he maintained himself on a rising ground in the neighbourhood, where he amused the enemy, until two battalions of grenadiers came to his assistance. Thus reinforced, he repulsed the French, pursued them them for three leagues, and drove them with a considerable loss from Gissa, where they had resolved to fix their quarters. These skirmishes happened in the beginning of May, when the grand armies were just in motion to begin the campaign.

By this time the forces under the mareschal duke de Broglie were augmented to one hundred thousand; while the count de St. Germain commanded a separate army on the Rhine, consisting of thirty thousand men, assembled from the quarters of Dusseldorp, Cologne, Cleves, and Wesel. This second corps was intended to divide the allied army, which, by such a division, would be considerably weakened; and the French court threatened to form a third army, under the prince de Soubise; but this was never assembled. The duke de Broglie was in such favour with the French ministry at this juncture, that he was promoted over the heads of many old generals, who now demanded and obtained their dismissal; and every step was taken to render the campaign glorious to this spirited commander: but, notwithstanding all their care, and his own activity, he found it impossible to take the field early enough in the spring, from want of forage for his cavalry. While his quarters were established at Frankfort, his troops were plentifully supplied with all sorts of provision from the Upper Rhine; but this convenience depended upon his being master of the course of the river: nor could he move from this position without forfeiting the advantage, and providing magazines for the use of his forces; so that he was obliged to lie inactive until he could have the benefit of green forage in his march.

The same inconveniences lay more heavy on prince Ferdinand, who, being in an exhausted country, was obliged to fall back as far as Paderborn, and draw his supplies from Hamburgh and Bremen on the Elbe and the Weser. By this time, however, he had received a reinforcement of British troops from Embden, under the command of major-general Griffin; and before the end of the campaign the forces of that nation in Germany were augmented to five and twenty thousand. The allied army marched from their cantonments on the fifth day of May, and proceeded by the way of Paderborn to Fritzlar, where, on the twentieth, they encamped; but part of the troops left in the bishopric of Munster, under general Sporcken, were ordered to form a camp at Dulmen, to make head against the French corps commanded by the count de St. Germain.

General Imhoff was sent with a detachment to Kirchayn on the Orme; and general Gilsoe, with another corps, advanced to the neighbourhood of Hirschfeld on the Fulda. The former of these having ordered colonel Luckner to scour the country with a body of hussars, that officer, on the twenty-fourth day of May, fell in with a French patrolle, which gave the alarm at Butzbach, when the garrison of that place, amounting to five hundred picquets, under general Waldener, fled with great precipitation. Being, however, pursued and overtaken near a wood, they were routed and dispersed. Colonel Luckner, entering Butzbach, found a considerable quantity of forage, flour, wine, and equipage, belonging to the fugitives. What he could not carry off, he distributed among the poor inhabitants, and returned to general Imhoff's camp at Ameneburg, with above an hundred prisoners. This excursion alarmed the enemy to such a degree, that their whole army was put in motion; and the duke de Broglie, in person, advanced with a large body of troops as far as Friedberg: but understanding the allies had not quitted their camp at Fritzlar, he returned to Frankfort, after having cantoned that part of his army in the Wetteraw.

This alarm was not so mortifying as the secession of the Wirtemberg troops, amounting to ten thousand men, commanded by their duke in person, who left the French army in disgust, and returned to his own country. The Imperial army, under the prince de Deuxponts, quartered at Bamberg, began their march to Naunberg on the twentieth of May; but one of their detachments of cavalry having received a check from a body of Prussians near Lutzen, they fell back; and on the fourth day of June encamped at Lichtenfels upon the Maine. The small detachments of the grand armies, as well as those belonging to the bodies commanded by general Sporcken and the count de St. Germain in the neighbourhood of Dusseldorp, skirmished with various success. The hereditary prince of Brunswic being detached from the allied army, with some battalions of grenadiers and two regiments of English dragoons, advanced to the county of Fulda, where he was joined by the troops under general Gilsoe, and performed some inconsiderable exploits, particularly at Hofenfeldt and Zielbach, where he surprised and took divers parties of the enemy.

By the twenty-fourth of June prince Ferdinand, quitting his camp at Fritzlar, advanced to Frillendorf, and took post on the hills between Ziegenheim and Freysa, general Imhoff commanding at a small distance on the right, and the hereditary prince, now returned from Fulda, being stationed on the left of the army. In the mean time, the duke de Broglie, assembling his forces between Merlau and Laubach, advanced to Neustadt, where he encamped on the twenty-eighth day of the month, and at the same time occupied a strong post at Wassenburg. His intention was to penetrate through the country of Hesse into Hanover, and make himself entirely master of that electorate. With this view he resolved to effect a junction with the count de St. Germain, whom he ordered to advance towards Brilau and Corbach; while he himself decamping from Neustadt on the eighth day of July, advanced by the way of Frankenberg. Prince Ferdinand, having received intelligence that the count de St. Germain was in motion, began his march from Ziegenheim, and on the ninth day of July reached the heights of Brunau, in the neighbourhood of Wildungen.

The hereditary prince, at the head of the advanced corps, reinforced with some battalions and squadrons under major-general Griffin, was sent forwards to Saxenhausen, whither the army followed the next morning. The hereditary prince, continuing to advance, found the enemy already formed at Corbach; but supposing their whole force did not exceed ten thousand infantry and seventeen squadrons, and being impelled by the ardour of his own courage, he resolved to give them battle. He accordingly attacked them about two in the afternoon, and the action became very warm warm and obstinate: but the enemy being continually reinforced with fresh battalions, and having the advantage of a numerous artillery, all the prince's efforts were ineffectual. Prince Ferdinand, being at too great a distance to support him, sent him an order to rejoin the army, which was by this time formed at Saxenhausen. He forthwith made dispositions for a retreat, which, however, was attended with great confusion. The enemy perceiving the disorder of the allied troops, plied their artillery with redoubled vigour; while a powerful body of their cavalry charged with irresistible fury. In all likelihood, the whole infantry of the allies would have been cut off, had not the hereditary prince made a diversion in their favour, by charging in person at the head of the British dragoons, who acted with their usual gallantry and spirit. This respite furnished them with an opportunity of effecting their retreat to Saxenhausen; but they lost above five hundred men, and fifteen pieces of cannon. General count Keilmansegge, major-general Griffin, and major Hill of Bland's dragoons, distinguished themselves by their conduct and intrepidity on this occasion.

The hereditary prince exposed his life in the hottest part of the action, and received a slight wound in the shoulder, which gave him far less uneasiness than he felt from the chagrin and mortification produced by his defeat.

Many days, however, did not pass, before he found an opportunity of retrieving his honour. Prince Ferdinand, receiving intelligence that a body of the enemy, commanded by major-general Glau-bitz, had advanced on the left of the allies to Ziegenheim, detached the hereditary prince to oppose them, at the head of six battalions of Hanoverians and Hessians, with Elliot's regiment of light horse, Luckner's hussars, and two brigades of Chasseurs. On the sixteenth day of the month, he attacked the enemy near the village of Exdorff, and a very warm action ensued, in which Elliot's regiment performed feats of the most undaunted valour. Though this was the first time they had appeared in the field, they out-did in courage the most experienced veterans. They charged five different times, and broke through the enemy at every charge: but these exploits they did not achieve without sustaining a heavy loss in officers, men, and horses. At length victory declared for the allies. Five battalions of the enemy, including the commander in chief, and the prince of Anhalt Cothen, were taken, with six pieces of cannon, and all their arms, baggage, and artillery.

During these transactions, the marshal duke de Broglie remained encamped on the heights of Corbach. He had, in advancing from Frankfort, left detachments to reduce the castles of Marburg and Dillemburg, which were occupied by the allies; and they fell into his hands, the garrisons of both being obliged to surrender prisoners of war. These were but inconsiderable conquests; nor did the progress of the French general equal the idea which had been formed of his talents and activity. The count de St. Germain, who was his senior officer, and believed by many to be at least his equal in capacity, having now joined his corps to the grand army, and conceiving disgust at his being obliged to serve under the duke de Broglie, threw up his command, in which he was succeeded by the chevalier de Muy. At the same time, the marquis de Voyer, and the count de Luc, two generals of experience and reputation, quitted the army, and returned to France, actuated by the same motives.

The allied army having advanced from Saxenhausen to the village of Halle, near Cassel, remained in that situation till the thirtieth day of July, when the troops were again put in motion. The chevalier de Muy, having crossed the Dymel at Stadbergen, with the reserve of the French army, amounting to thirty-five thousand men, and extending these troops down the banks of the river, in order to cut off the communication of the allies with Westphalia; while the duke de Broglie marched up with his main body to their camp at Kalle, and prince Xavier of Saxony, who commanded their reserve on the left, advanced towards Cassel; prince Ferdinand, leaving general Kielmansegge with a body of forces for the defence of that city, decamped in the night of the thirtieth, and passed the Dymel without loss, between Liebenau and Dringleberg. The hereditary prince, who had the preceding day crossed the same river, in order to reinforce general Sporcken, who was posted near Corbeke, now reconnoitred the position of the enemy, and found them possessed of a very advantageous camp between Warbourg and Ochsendorff. Prince Ferdinand, having resolved to attack them, ordered the hereditary prince and Mr. Sporcken to turn their left, while he himself advanced against their front, with the main body of his army.

The enemy was accordingly attacked, almost at the same instant, both in flank and in rear, with equal impetuosity and success. As the infantry of the allied army could not march fast enough to charge at the same time, the marquis of Granby was ordered to advance with the cavalry of the right; and the brigade of English artillery, commanded by captain Philips, made such expedition, that they were up in time to second the attack in a most surprising manner. All the French cavalry, except three squadrons, fled with precipitation at the approach of the marquis; and these were entirely broke at the very first charge. Then the English horse fell upon the enemy's infantry, which suffered greatly, while the town of Warbourg was assaulted by the Britannic legion. The French being hard pressed on both flanks, as well as in front and rear, betook themselves to flight, with considerable damage, occasioned chiefly by the British cannon and dragoons, and many were drowned in attempting to ford the Dymel. The battalion of Maxwell, and a brigade under general Beckwith, composed of grenadiers and Highlanders, distinguished themselves remarkably on this occasion. The enemy left about fifteen hundred men, killed or wounded, in the field of battle, with some colours, and ten pieces of cannon, and about the same number were taken prisoners. Monsieur de Muy lay all night under arms, on the heights of Volk-Missen, from whence he retired to Wolfshagen. On the evening of the battle, the marquis of Granby received orders to pass the river in pursuit of them, with twelve British battalions, and ten squadrons, and encamped at Wilda, about four miles from Warbourg, the heights of which were occupied by the enemy's grand army.

By this success, prince Ferdinand was enabled to maintain his communication with Westphalia, and keep keep the enemy at a distance from the heart of Hanover; but to these objects he was obliged to sacrifice the country of Cassel; for prince Xavier of Saxony, at the head of a detached body, much more numerous than that which was left under general Kielmansegge, advanced towards Cassel, and made himself master of that city; then he reduced Munden, Gottingen, and Elmbeck, in the electorate of Hanover. All that prince Ferdinand could do, considering how much he was outnumbered by the French, was to secure posts and passes with a view to retard their progress, and employ detachments to harass and surprise their advanced parties.

In a few days after the action at Warbourg, general Luckner repulsed a French detachment which had advanced as far as Elmbeck, and surprised another at Nordheim. About the same time colonel Donap, with a body of the allied army, attacked a French corps of two thousand men, posted in the wood of Sababourg, to maintain the communication between their grand army and their troops on the other side of the Weser; and, notwithstanding the strength of their situation, drove them from their post, with the loss of five hundred men, either killed or made prisoners: but this advantage was more than counterbalanced by the reduction of Ziegenhain, garrisoned by seven hundred men of the allied army, who, after a vigorous resistance, were forced to surrender themselves prisoners of war. On the fifth day of August, prince Ferdinand being encamped at Buhne, received intimation that a considerable body of the enemy, amounting to upwards of twenty thousand men, were preparing to make a general forage in the neighbourhood of Geismar. He immediately formed a resolution to defeat their intention. With this view he passed the Dymel early in the morning, with a body of troops and some artillery, and posted them in such an advantageous manner as to oblige the enemy to abandon their purpose.

On the same morning the hereditary prince set out on an expedition to beat up the quarters of a French detachment. Being informed that a body of their horse and foot, amounting to upwards of two thousand men, were cantoned at Zierenberg, at a small distance from the French camp at Dierenberg, and passed their time in the most careless security, he advanced towards them from his camp at Warbourg. About a league on the other side of the Dymel, at the village of Witzen, they were joined by the light troops under major Bulow; and now the disposition was made, both for entering the town, and securing a retreat, in case of being repulsed.

When they had arrived within two miles, they divided into three bodies, which took three different routes, by which the place was completely surrounded. At eight in the evening they set out from Warbourg, and came before this place at two the following morning. Notwithstanding the precautions taken, the trampling of the troops over the gardens gave the alarm to a guard of the enemy's dragoons, who immediately began to fire. Strict orders had been given to proceed with as little noise as possible, and to reserve their fire; and such was the deliberate courage, such the perfect discipline of the British forces, that they sustained the enemy's fire, pushed on with their bayonets, drove back the French piquets, killed the guard at the gate, and entered the towns along with the fugitives, without the least noise, hurry, or confusion. Never was surprize more complete.

The column of the British forces having forced the gate, advanced regularly with their bayonets fixed, and without firing a musquet, through the two streets that led to their church-yard (which, being the only open part of the town, served the French as a place of arms) killing or taking a great number of those who ran from the houses towards this place of rendezvous; and thus they advanced with the greatest order and the most profound silence, until they reached the church-yard. The night was so dark, that they formed by the side of the French, who for a while took them to be their own piquets that had assembled: but they were soon undeceived: a fierce encounter with bayonets ensued, in which the French were quickly obliged to give way. Two regiments of the enemy's dragoons endeavoured to fly to their camp; but they found it occupied by four hundred grenadiers, who drove them back with their bayonets. Forced from hence, they fled to another gate; but there they were repulsed with a sharp fire of small arms. Then they were compelled to separate; and flying at random as fortune and the night directed, made their escape at the several breaches of the wall. The prince was master of the place in about an hour; but the nearness of the French camp and the approach of day, prevented so long a continuance in the town as he wished for reaping the full fruits of his victory: therefore about three o'clock he began his retreat, carrying off two pieces of cannon, thirty-six officers, and about five hundred private men. The slaughter also of the enemy was considerable. The prince reached his camp without the least molestation in his retreat.

If we consider the difficulty of this attempt, very few have been bolder; if we examine the dispositions, none could be conducted with greater wisdom; if we attend to the behaviour of the troops we shall no where find an example of more exact obedience, discipline, and courage. To attack so large a body of the enemy so strongly posted, within little more than a league of their grand camp; to march so far in that critical situation, and in a very dark night; to divide into so many parts, yet to act with so much order and so entire a concert, was certainly an exploit of the very first rank; and, though not of any great importance in its consequences, is so admirable in its conduct and execution, that it well deserves to be particularly narrated. This added greatly to the reputation of the English as soldiers, and no less to their honour as men, by the humanity they shewed to their prisoners, and the generous sentiments of the common sort with regard to money, as there were several noble instances that night of their refusing to take any thing from their prisoners, who had offered them their purses. They lost but ten men.

From this period the operations of the two armies, which for a time seemed to languish, were renewed with fresh vigour. Prince Ferdinand perceived, that whilst the enemy's communication with the Rhine, and with Frankfort on the Maine, continued open, it would be to very little purpose to attempt any thing either for the relief of Gottingen or Cassel. Their progress indeed into Hanover had been checked; but whilst they still continued in so advanced a position, it was evidently impossible to prevent their making very ruinous inroads into that country. To force them to a battle against their inclination, would be difficult, and the attempt itself dangerous. There remained but one method, which was to make frequent and strong detachments into the southern parts of Hesse and Wetteravia, and thus render precarious the enemy's communication with the Rhine and Maine, from whence they drew the greatest part of their supplies of all kinds.

With this view he detached major Bulow at the head of a strong corps, who pushed forward toward Marburg, surprised the town, destroyed the French ovens, and brought off a considerable quantity of stores and baggage, with some prisoners. He met with the same success at Butzbach, where he surprised and took two companies belonging to the regiment of Raugrave, and retired with his body to Frankenberg, where he joined colonel Forfen. On the twelfth day of September they made a movement towards Frankenau; and M. de Stainville, who was posted with a body of French troops at Merdenhagen, advanced to check their progress. He came up with their rear in the neighbourhood of Munden, and attacked them in passing the river Orck with such vigour, that Forfen, with some of his cavalry, was taken, and Bulow obliged to abandon some pieces of cannon.

The action was just determined when this last was reinforced by the hereditary prince of Brunswick, who had made a forced march of five German miles, which had fatigued the troops to such a degree, that he deferred his attack till next morning; but in the mean time, M. de Stainville retired towards Frankenberg. The Hanoverian general Wangenheim, at the head of four battalions and six squadrons, had driven the enemy from the defiles of Soheite, and encamped at Lawenthagen; but, being attacked by a superior number, he was obliged in his turn to give way, and his retreat was not effected without the loss of two hundred men, and some pieces of artillery. When the enemy retired, general Wangenheim repassed the Weser, and occupied his former situation at Uffar. Mean while, general Luckner gained an advantage over a detachment of French cavalry near Norten. Prince Ferdinand, when marshal Broglie quitted his camp at Immenhausen, made a motion of his troops, and established his head quarters at Geismarwells, the residence of the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel: from thence, however, he transferred them about the latter end of September to Ovilgune, on the Westphalian side of the Dymel.

Such was the position of the two opposite grand armies, when the world was surprised by an expedition to the Lower Rhine, made by the hereditary prince of Brunswick. Whether this excursion was intended to hinder the French from reinforcing their army in Westphalia, or to co-operate in the Low Countries with the armament now ready equipped in the ports of England; or to gratify the ambition of a young prince, overboiling with courage, and glowing with the desire of conquest, certain it is, the Austrian Netherlands were at this juncture entirely destitute of troops, except the French garrisons of Ostend and Nieuport, which were weak and inconsiderable. Had ten thousand English troops been landed on the coast of Blankenburg, they might have taken possession of Bruges, Ghent, Brussels, and Antwerp, without resistance, and joined the hereditary prince in the heart of the country: in that case, he would have found himself at the head of thirty thousand men, and might have made such a diversion in favour of Hanover, as to transfer the seat of war from Westphalia into Flanders. The empress-queen might indeed have complained of this invasion, as the formality of declaring war against her had not been observed by Great Britain; but, considering that she was the declared enemy of Hanover, and had violated the barrier-treaty, in establishing which the kingdom of Great Britain had lavished so much blood and treasure; a step of this kind, it was thought, might have been taken without any imputation of perfidy or injustice.

Whatever were the motives for the prince's expedition, he certainly quitted the grand army of the allies in the month of September, and traversing Westphalia with twenty battalions and ten squadrons, appeared on the Lower Rhine, marching by Schermbeck and Duffeldorp. On the twenty-ninth day of the month he sent a large detachment over the river at Rocroot, which surprised part of the French partizan Fischer's corps at Rhyenberg, and scoured the country. Next day, other parties crossing at Rees and Emerick, took possession of some redoubts which the French had raised along the bank of the river; and here they found a number of boats sufficient to transport the rest of the forces. Then the prince advanced to Cleves, and at his approach the French garrison, consisting of five hundred men, under the command of M. de Barrel, retired into the castle, which however they did not long defend; for on the third day of October they capitulated, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war, after having in vain endeavoured to obtain more favourable conditions.

A more important object was Wesel, which the prince invested, and began to besiege in form. The approaches were made on the right of the Rhine, while the prince in person remained on the left to cover the siege; and preserved his communication open with the other side, by a bridge above and another below the place. He had hoped to carry it by a vigorous assault, without the formality of a regular siege; but he met with a warmer reception than he expected; and his operations were retarded by heavy rains, which, by swelling the river, endangered his bridges, and laid his trenches under water. The difficulties and delays occasioned by this circumstance entirely disappointed his design. The French being informed of his motions, were not slow in taking measures to anticipate his success. M. de Castres was detached after him with thirty battalions and thirty-eight squadrons; and by forced marches arrived, on the fourteenth day of October, at Rhyenberg, where the prince's light troops were posted. These he attacked immediately, and compelled to abandon the post, notwithstanding all the efforts of the prince, who commanded in person, and appeared in the warmest part of this short but sanguinary affair. The enemy, leaving five battalions with some squadrons at Rhyenberg, proceeded by the left, and encamped behind the convent of Campen.

The

The prince having received intimation that M. de Castries was not yet joined by some reinforcements that were on the march, determined to be before-hand with them, and attempt that very night to surprise him in his camp. For this purpose he began his march at ten in the evening, after having left four battalions and five squadrons under general Bock, with instructions to observe Rhynberg, and attack that post in case the attempt on Campen should succeed. Before the allied forces could reach the enemy's camp, they were under the necessity of overpowering Fischer's corps of irregulars, which occupied the convent of Campen, at the distance of half a league in their front. This service occasioned some firing, the noise of which alarmed the French army. Their commander formed them with great expedition, and posted them in a wood, where they were immediately attacked, and at first obliged to give ground; but they soon found means to recover their ranks, and sustained, without flinching, an unceasing fire of musquetry, from five in the morning till nine at night, when they reaped the fruits of their perseverance. The hereditary prince, whose horse was killed under him, seeing no prospect of success in prolonging an action which had already cost him a considerable number of men, thought proper to give orders for a retreat, which was not effected without confusion, and left the field of battle to the enemy. His loss on this occasion did not fall short of sixteen hundred choice men, killed, wounded, and taken; and this loss fell chiefly on the troops of Great Britain, who were always found in the hottest parts of the battle. All their officers, both of infantry and dragoons, distinguished themselves remarkably, and many were dangerously wounded. Among these, the nation regretted the loss of lord Downe, whose wounds proved mortal: he was a young nobleman of spirit, who had lately embraced a military life, though he was not regularly trained up in the service.

Next day, which was the sixteenth of October, the enemy attacked an advanced body of the allies, which was posted in a wood before Elverick, and extended along the Rhine. The firing of cannon and musquetry was maintained till night. Meanwhile, a column of the French infantry, commanded by M. de Chabot, marched through Walach, and took post among the thickets, at the distance of a quarter of a league, in the front of the prince's army. By this time, the Rhine was so much swelled by the rains, and the banks of it were overflowed in such a manner, that it was necessary to repair and move lower down the bridge, which had been thrown over that river. This work was accordingly performed in presence of the enemy, and the prince, passing without molestation, proceeded to Bruynen, where he fixed his head-quarters. His passing the Rhine so easily, not only under the eye, but also within the grasp of a superior and victorious army, may be reckoned among the fortunate incidents of his life.

In the month of November, while he lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Schermbeck, a body of the enemy attempted to beat up his quarters: having received intimation of their design, he immediately called in his advanced posts, and made a disposition for giving them a proper reception. He abandoned the tents that were in the front of his camp, and posted his infantry in ambuscade behind those that were in the rear: at the same time he ordered some regiments of horse and hussars to take a compass, and fall upon the back of the enemy. The stratagem was crown'd with the desired success. The French detachment, believing the allies had actually abandoned their camp, began to pillage the tents in the utmost disorder: then the infantry sallied from the place where they were concealed, and fell upon them with irresistible fury; the artillery opened, and the cavalry charged them in flank. In a word, of twelve hundred who marched from Wesel on this expedition, scarce two hundred escaped.

The duke de Broglie attempted, by sundry means, to take advantage of the allied army on the other side of the Weser, thus weakened by the absence of the troops under the hereditary prince; but he found prince Ferdinand too vigilant to be surprised, and too strongly situated to be attacked with any prospect of success. He therefore contented himself with wasting the country by detachments: he sent M. de Stainville with a considerable body of forces to penetrate into the heart of Hanover; and on the fifteenth day of September, that officer falling in with a detachment of the allies, commanded by major Bulow, attacked them near the abbey of Schaken. After a warm and obstinate engagement, they were defeated and pursued to Bulemont, with the loss of their cannon, baggage, and a good number of men, who fell into the hands of the victors. After this exploit, M. de Stainville advanced to Halberstadt, and demanded of that capital a contribution of one million five hundred thousand livres; but the citizens had been so exhausted by former exactions, that they could not raise above thirty thousand: for the remainder the French partizan took hostages, with whom he returned to the grand army encamped at Cassel, from whence they, in a little time, fell back as far as Gottingen.

As the enemy retired, prince Ferdinand advanced as far as Hurste, where he fixed his head quarters about the latter end of November. While he continued in this position, several skirmishes happened in the neighbourhood of Gottingen. Major-general Breidenbach, at the head of two regiments of Hanoverian and Brunswick guards, with a detachment of cavalry, attacked on the twenty-ninth day of November, the French post at Heydemunden, upon the river Worrau. This he carried, together with the town, which the enemy hastily abandoned. Part of their detachment crossed the river in boats; the rest threw themselves into an intrenchment that covered the passage, which the allies endeavoured to force in several unsuccessful attempts, galled as they were by the fire of the enemy's redoubts on the other side of the river. At length M. Breidenbach was obliged to desist and retire into the town, from whence he withdrew at midnight, after having sustained considerable damage.

Prince Ferdinand had it very much at heart to drive the French from Gottingen, and accordingly invested that city; but the French garrison, which was numerous and well provided, made such a vigorous resistance, as baffled all the attempts of the allies, who were moreover incommoded by the rainy rainy weather, which, added to other considerations, prevented them from undertaking the siege in form. Nevertheless, they kept the place blocked up from the twenty-second day of November to the twelfth of the following month, when the garrison, in a desperate sally, took one of their principal posts, and compelled them to abandon the enterprise. About the middle of December, prince Ferdinand withdrew into winter quarters, he himself residing at Ullar, and the English troops being cantoned in the bishopric of Paderborn. Thus the enemy were left in possession of Hesse, and the whole country eastward of the Weser to the frontiers of the electorate of Hanover.

The king of Prussia, after all his labours, notwithstanding the great talents he had displayed, and the incredible efforts he had made, still found himself environed by his enemies, and in danger of being crushed, by their closing and contracting their circle. Even the Swedes, who had languished so long, seemed to be roused to action in Pomerania, during the severity of the winter-season. The Prussian general Manteuffel had, on the twentieth day of January, crossed the river Peene, repulsed the advanced posts of the enemy at Zieten, and penetrated as far as the neighbourhood of Griesswalde; but finding the Swedes on their guard, he returned to Anclam, where his head quarters were established. This insult was soon retaliated with interest. On the twenty-eighth day of the month, at five in the morning, a body of Swedes attacked the Prussian troops posted in the suburbs of Anclam, on the other side of the Peene, and drove them into the city, which they entered pell-mell. General Manteuffel, being alarmed, endeavoured to rally the troops, but was wounded and taken, with about two hundred men and three pieces of cannon. The victors, having performed this exploit, returned to their own quarters. As for the Russian army, which had wintered on the other side of the Vistula, the season was pretty far advanced before it could take the field; though general Tottleben was detached from it about the beginning of June, at the head of ten thousand Cossacks, and other light troops, with which he made an inroad into Pomerania, and fixed his head quarters at Belgard.

At the beginning of the campaign the king of Prussia's chief aim was to take measures for the defence of Silesia, the conquest of which seemed to be the principal object which the court of Vienna had in view. While the Austrian army under count Daun lay strongly intrenched in the neighbourhood of Dresden, the king of Prussia had attempted, in the month of December, to make him quit that advantageous situation, by cutting off his provisions, and making an incursion into Bohemia. For these purposes he had taken possession of Dippelwalde, Maxen, and Pretchendorff, as if he intended to enter Bohemia by the way of Pafsberg; but this scheme being found impracticable, he returned to his camp at Freyberg; and in January the Prussian and Austrian armies were cantoned so near each other that daily skirmishes were fought with various success. The head of the Prussian camp was occupied by a body of four thousand men under general Zettwitz, who, upon the twenty-ninth day of January was attacked with such irresistible fury by the Austrian general Beck, that he retreated in great confusion to Torgau, with the loss of five hundred men, eight pieces of artillery, and a considerable quantity of new cloathing, and other baggage.

Another advantage of the same nature was gained by the Austrians at Newstadt over a small body of Prussians who guarded that city. In the month of march general Laudohn advanced with a strong detachment of horse and foot, in order to surprise the Prussians, who, in endeavouring to accomplish a retreat to Steinau, were surrounded accordingly, and very roughly handled. General Laudohn summoned them twice by sound of trumpet to lay down their arms; but their commanders, the captains Blumenthal and Zittwitz, rejecting the proposal with disdain, the enemy attacked them on all hands with a great superiority of number. In this emergency the Prussian captains formed their troops into a square, and by a close continued fire kept the enemy at bay; until, perceiving that the Croats had taken possession of a wood between Siebenhausen and Steinau, they, in apprehension of being intercepted, abandoned their baggage, and forced their way to Steinau, which they reached with great difficulty, having been continually harrassed by the Austrians, who paid dear for this advantage. Several other petty exploits of this kind were achieved by detachments on both sides, before the campaign was opened by the grand armies.

Towards the end of April, the king of Prussia altered his position, and withdrew that part of his chain of cantonments, which extended from the forest of Thurundt to the right of the Elbe. He now took possession of a very strong camp, between the Elbe and the Mulda, which he intrenched in every part that was accessible, and fortified with two hundred and fifty pieces of cannon. By these precautions he was enabled to keep his ground against the army of count Daun, and at the same time detach a body of troops as a reinforcement to his brother prince Henry, who collected a separate army near Franckfort upon the Oder, that he might be at hand either to oppose the Russians, or march to the relief of Silesia, which the enemy was bent upon invading. It was for this purpose that the Austrian general Laudohn advanced with a considerable army into Lusatia, about the beginning of May, and general Beck with another body of troops took possession of Cobus. Mean while count Daun continued in his old situation on the Elbe; general Lacy commanded a small detached army upon the frontiers of Saxony, to the southward of Dresden; and the prince de Deux-ponts marched into the same neighbourhood with the army of the empire.

Prince Henry of Prussia having encamped with his army for some time at Sagan in Silesia, proceeded from thence to Gorlitz in Lusatia, to watch the motions of general Laudohn, encamped at Koningsgratz; from whence, in the beginning of June, he marched into the county of Glatz, and advanced to the neighbourhood of Schweidnitz, which he seemed determined to besiege, having a train of eighty pieces of cannon. In order to disappoint his design, prince Henry reinforced the body of troops under general Fouquet; and at the same time sent a detachment into Pomerania under colonel Lessow, who defeated the rear-guard of general general Tottleben, and obliged that officer to abandon Pomerania. By this time, however, the marechal Soltikoff had arrived from Petersbourg, and taken the command of the grand Russian army, which passed the Vistula in June, and began its march towards the frontiers of Silesia.

In the month of June general Laudohn made a fruitless attempt to carry Glatz by assault; but he was more successful in his next enterprize. Understanding that general Fouquet, who occupied the post at Landshut, had weakened himself by sending off detachments under the major-generals Ziethen and Grant, he resolved to attack him with such a superiority of number as he should not be able to withstand. Accordingly, on the twenty-third day of June, at two in the morning, he began the assault with his whole army upon some redoubts which Fouquet possessed; and these were carried one after another, though not without a desperate opposition. General Fouquet being summoned to surrender, refused to submit; and having received two wounds, was at length taken prisoner: about three hundred of his men escaped to Breslau; the rest were killed or taken; but the loss of the victors considerably exceeded that of the vanquished. In July general Laudohn undertook the siege of Glatz, which was taken after a very faint resistance; for, on the very day that the batteries were opened against the place, the garrison abandoned part of the fortifications, which the besiegers immediately occupied. The Prussians made repeated efforts to regain the ground they had lost, but they were repulsed in all their attempts. At length the garrison laid down their arms, and surrendered at discretion. In this place the enemy found an immense magazine, including above one hundred brass cannon, a great number of mortars, and a vast quantity of ammunition.

Laudohn, encouraged by the reduction of Glatz, advanced immediately to Breslau, which he began to bombard with great fury; but his chief hopes of success consisted in carrying the place by a sudden attack, or intimidating count Tavenzein the governor into an immediate surrender; for he knew the Russian army was at a considerable distance, and judged, from the character of prince Henry of Prussia, that he would advance to the relief of the place long before it could be taken according to the usual forms.

Influenced by these considerations, when he had invested the town, he sent a letter to the governor, specifying, that his army consisted of fifty battalions and fourscore squadrons; that the Russian army, amounting to seventy-five thousand men, was within three days march of Breslau; that no succour could be expected from the king of Prussia, encamped as he was on the other side of the Elbe, and overawed by the army of count Daun; that prince Henry, far from being in a condition to bring relief, would not be able to stand his ground against the Russians; that Breslau being an open mercantile town, not a fortress, could not be defended without contravening the established rules of war; and therefore the governor, in case of obstinacy, had no reason to expect an honourable capitulation, the benefit of which was now offered. He at the same time sent a memorial to the civil magistrates, threatening their town with destruction, which could by no other means be prevented than by joining with the inhabitants in persuading the governor to embrace immediately the terms that were proposed.

Count Tavenzein, instead of being intimidated, was encouraged by these menaces, which implied an apprehension in Laudohn that the place would be relieved. He therefore replied to the summons he had received, that Breslau was not simply a mercantile town, but ought to be considered as a place of strength, as being surrounded with works and wet ditches: that the Austrians themselves had defended it as such after the battle of Lissa, in the year 1757; that the king his master having commanded him to defend the place to the last extremity, he could neither comply with general Laudohn's proposals, nor pay the least regard to his threats of destroying the town, as he had not been intrusted with the care of the houses, but with the defence of the fortifications. The Austrian convinced him that same evening that he threatened nothing but what he meant to perform. He opened his batteries, and poured in upon the town a most terrible shower of bombs and red hot bullets, which continued till midnight. During this dreadful discharge, which filled the place with horror and desolation, he attempted the out-works by assault. The Croats attacked the covered way in different places with their usual impetuosity; but were repulsed with considerable loss, by the conduct and resolution of the governor and garrison. These proceedings having made no impression upon Tavenzein, the besieging general had recourse again to negotiation, and offered the most flattering articles of capitulation, which were rejected with disdain. The governor gave him to understand, that the destruction of the town had made no change in his resolution, though it was a practice contrary to the law of arms, as well as to the dictates of common humanity, to begin the siege of a fortress by ruining the inhabitants: finally, he assured him he would wait for him upon the ramparts, and defend the place to the utmost of his power.

To this extremity, however, he was not obliged to have recourse. Prince Henry of Prussia, one of the most accomplished generals of the age, having received repeated intelligence that the Russian army intended to join Laudohn at Breslau, determined to advance, and give them battle before the purposed junction. In the latter end of July he set out from Gleissen, and on the last day of that month had arrived at Linden near Slauve, where he learned that Tottleben's detachment only had passed through the plains of Polnich-Lissa, and that the grand Russian army had marched through Kosten and Gustin. The prince, finding it impossible to overtake them by that route, directed his march to Glogau, where he heard that Breslau was besieged by general Laudohn, and immediately advanced by forced marches to its relief. With such celerity did he proceed, that in five days he marched above one hundred and twenty English miles, and at his approach the Austrian general relinquished his enterprize. Thus, by his spirited and prudent conduct, he not only prevented the junction of the Russian and Austrian armies, but also saved the capital of Silesia, and streightened Laudohn in such a manner as subjected him to a defeat by the Prussian monarch, to whose motions it is now time to attend.

Whether his design was originally upon Dresden, or he proposed to act in concert with his brother prince Henry in Silesia, which his adversaries seemed to have chosen as the scene of their operations, we shall not pretend to determine: certain it is, in the beginning of July he began his march in two columns through Lusatia; and count Daun being apprised of his march, ordered his army to be put in motion. Committing the defence of Saxony to the army of the empire, and to the body of the troops under Lacy, he proceeded with great expedition towards Silesia, in full persuasion that the Prussian monarch had thither directed his route. On the seventh day of July the king, knowing that Daun was now removed at a distance, repassed the Pulsnitz, which he had crossed but two days before, and advanced with the van of his army towards Lichtenberg, in order to attack the forces of general Lacy, who was there encamped; but the Austrian retired at his approach. Then the army advanced to Marienstern, when the king understood that count Daun was in full march for Lauban, having already gained two marches upon the Prussians. Perhaps it was this intimation that induced the king to alter his plan, and return to the Elbe. On the eighth day of the month he repassed the Sprehe, in the neighbourhood of Bautzen, and proceeded towards Dresden with extraordinary diligence. On the thirteenth his army having passed the Elbe at Kadetz, on a bridge of boats, took post between Pirna and Dresden, which last he determined to besiege, in hope of reducing it before count Daun could return to its relief. In this expectation, however, he had the misfortune to be disappointed. General Macguire the governor being summoned to surrender, replied, that having the honour to be intrusted with the defence of the capital, he would maintain it till the last extremity. Batteries were immediately erected against the town on both sides of the Elbe, and the place overwhelmed with a dreadful bombardment; but this expedient proved altogether ineffectual. Though the suburbs towards the Pirna gate were attacked and carried, this advantage made no impression on general Macguire, who made several vigorous sallies, and took every necessary precaution for the defence of the city; encouraged moreover by the vicinity of Lacy's body and the army of the empire, encamped in an advantageous situation near Gros Seydlitz; and confident that count Daun would hasten to his relief: nor was it long before his expectations were answered. The Austrian general finding himself outwitted by the stratagem of the Prussian monarch, and being informed of his enterprize against Dresden, instantly wheeled about, and marched back with such rapidity, that on the nineteenth day of the month he arrived in the neighbourhood of that capital. In consequence of his approach, the king of Prussia, whose heavy artillery was now come up, redoubled his efforts against the city, so as to reduce to ashes the cathedral church, the new square, several noble streets, some palaces, together with the curious manufactory of porcelaine. These calamities, however, affected neither the fortifications nor the garrison, which count Daun found means to reinforce with sixteen battalions. This supply, and the neighbourhood of three hostile armies, rendered it altogether impossible to prosecute the siege with any prospect of success: the king therefore relinquished the enterprize, withdrew his troops and artillery, and endeavoured to bring Daun to a battle, which that general artfully declined.

The fate of this prince seemed now at its crisis. Notwithstanding all the efforts of his brother prince Henry, the Russians were fast advancing to join Laudohn, who had already blocked up Schweidnitz and Neiss, and their junction seemed to threaten the loss of all Silesia. The king had nothing to oppose to superior numbers, but superior activity, of which he determined to avail himself without delay. Instead of making a feint towards Silesia, he resolved to march thither in earnest; and with that view passing the Elbe, encamped at Dallwitz, on the farther bank of the river, leaving general Hulsen with fifteen thousand men in the intrenched camp at Schlettow, to preserve his footing in Saxony. On the third day of August he began his march for Silesia, followed by count Daun with the grand Austrian army, while the detached body under Lacy took post at Rechenberg, and the imperial army encamped at Xesseldorf. Both the Prussians and Austrians marched at the rate of one hundred miles in five days. On the tenth the king took possession of the camp of Lignitz; and here he seemed in danger of being quite environed by the enemy, who occupied the whole ground between Parchwitz and Cossendau, an extent of thirty miles. Count Daun's army lay in the center of this chain, possessing the Heights of Whalstadt and Hochkirk; general Laudohn covered the ground between Jeischendorf and Coschitz: the rising grounds of Parchwitz were secured by general Nauendorff; and M. de Beck, who formed the left, extended his troops beyond Cossendau.

The king marched, in the night of the eleventh, with a view to turn the enemy, and advance to Jauer: but at break of day he discovered a new camp at Prausnitz, which consisted of Lacy's detachment, just arrived from Lauban. The Prussians immediately crossed the Katzbach to attack this general; but he made such a skilful disposition for a retreat towards the army of count Daun, that he not only baffled the attempts of the king to bring him to action, but, by posting himself on the Heights of Hennerdorff, prevented his march to Jauer. In vain did the Prussian monarch endeavour next day to turn the enemy on the side of the mountain, by Pomsen and Jagerdorff; the roads were found impassable to the ammunition-waggons, and the king returned to the camp at Lignitz.

While he remained in this situation, he received intelligence that twenty-four thousand Russians, under count Czernichew, had formed bridges over the Oder at Auras, where they proposed to pass that river, and he imagined the enemy had conceived a design to close him in, and attack him with their joint forces. Daun had indeed projected a plan for surprising him in the night, and had actually put his army in motion for that purpose; but he was anticipated by the vigilance and good fortune of the Prussian monarch. That prince, reflecting that if he should wait for his adversaries in his camp, he ran the risque of being attacked at the same time by Lacy on his right, by Daun in his front, and by Laudohn on his left, he changed his position, in order to disconcert their operations; operations; and on the fourteenth day of the month proceeded to the Heights of Pfaffendorff, where he drew up his army in order of battle. Being informed, about two in the morning, that Laudohn was in full march, advancing in columns, by Benowitz, he divided his army into two separate bodies. One of these continued on the ground, in order to defend the post against any attempts that might be made by count Daun to assist Laudohn; and that this service might be the more effectually performed, the Heights were fortified with batteries, so judiciously disposed as to check and overawe the whole Austrian army.

The king having taken this precaution, wheeled about with sixteen battalions and thirty squadrons, to attack Laudohn as he should advance; but that general knew nothing of his design, until he himself arrived at the village of Pfaffendorff about three in the morning, when the day dawning, and a thick fog gradually dispersing, the whole detachment of the Prussian army appeared in order of battle, in a well chosen situation, strengthened with a numerous train of artillery, placed to the best advantage. Laudohn was equally mortified and surprised to find himself caught in his own snare; but he had advanced too far to recede, and therefore making a virtue of necessity, determined to stand an engagement. With this view he formed his troops as well as the time, place, and circumstances would permit; and the Prussians advancing to the attack, a severe action ensued. The king rode along the lines to animate the troops, and superintended every part of the charge, hazarding his life in the most dangerous scenes of the battle to such a degree, that his horse was killed under him, and his cloaths were shot through in several places. The Austrians maintained the conflict with great obstinacy until six in the morning, when they gave way, and were pursued to the Katzbach, beyond which the king would not allow his troops to prosecute the advantage they had gained, that they might be at hand to succour the right, in case mareschal count Daun should succeed in his attempt to advance against them from Lignitz. That general had actually begun his march to attack the Prussians on one side, while Laudohn should charge them on the other; but he was not a little surprised to find they were decamped; and when he perceived a thick cloud of smoke at a distance, he immediately comprehended the nature of the king's manœuvre. He then endeavoured to advance by Lignitz; but the troops and artillery which had been left on the Height of Pfaffendorff, to oppose his march, were so advantageously posted as to render all his attempts ineffectual. Laudohn is said to have lost in the action about eight thousand men, killed, wounded, and taken, including eighty-four officers, with twenty-three pair of colours, and eighty-two pieces of cannon; and this loss was greatly increased by the desertion with which it was followed. The Prussians obtained the victory at the expence of one general, with five hundred men killed, and twelve hundred wounded. Immediately after the action the king proceeded to Parchwitz; while Daun detached prince Lowenstein and general Beck, with the reserve of his army, to join prince Czernichew, who had passed the Oder at Auras; but he was so thunderstruck by the defeat at Lignitz, that he forthwith repassed the river, and prince Lowenstein retreated on the side of Jauer. By this bold and well-conducted adventure, the Prussian monarch not only escaped the most imminent hazard of a total defeat from the joint efforts of two strong armies, but also prevented the dreadful junction of the Russian and Austrian forces.

His business now was to open the communication with Breslau and his brother prince Henry, whom he joined at Newmarcke. The prince, after Laudohn was compelled to abandon the siege of Breslau, had narrowly watched the motions of the Russian army, which had advanced into the neighbourhood of that city, and without all doubt would have bombarded it from some commanding heights, had not they been prevented by prince Henry, who took possession of these posts, and fortified them with redoubts. The king having delivered Breslau from the neighbourhood of his enemies, and being reinforced by his brother's army, left a considerable detachment under the command of general Goltze, to secure the country against the Russian irregulars, and advanced with his whole force to the relief of Schweidnitz, which was blocked up by the Austrian army under the command of the mareschal count Daun. In his march he attacked a separate body under general Beck, made two battalions of Croats prisoners, and dispersed several squadrons. This achievement had such an effect upon the enemy, that they raised the blockade, and retreated with some precipitation to the mountains of Landshut.

While the king exerted himself with so much spirit and success, in the defence of Silesia, general Hulsen, who commanded his troops in Saxony, was exposed to the most imminent danger. Being informed that the army of the empire had laid a plan for cutting off his communication with Torgau, he instantly decamped from Meissen, and marched to Strehla. The enemy having divided their forces into two bodies, one of them, on the twentieth day of August, attacked an advanced post of the Prussians; while the other was disposed in such a manner as to overawe Hulsen's camp, and prevent him from taking any step for the relief of his battalions, who maintained their ground with difficulty against the superior number of the assailants. In this emergency the Prussian general ordered his cavalry to take a circuit round a rising ground, and if possible attack the enemy in flank. This order was executed with equal vigor and success. They rushed upon the imperial army with such impetuosity, as drove their battalions and horse upon each other in the utmost confusion. A considerable number of the enemy were killed, and forty-one officers, with twelve hundred men, made prisoners. By this advantage, which was gained at a very small expence, general Hulsen opened for himself a way to Torgau, whither he instantly retreated, observing that the whole army of the imperialists was advancing to cut off his communication with the Elbe; and this retreat furnished the enemy with a pretext for claiming the victory.

After all these heroic exploits of the Prussian monarch and his officers, his affairs continued in such a desperate situation as seemed to forebode approaching ruin: for though in person he commanded a numerous and gallant army, he found it absolutely impossible to guard against the different rent detachments from the three separate armies of his adversaries. Bodies of Austrian troops scoured the country of Lusatia; the Russians traversed part of Silesia, and made incursions even into Brandenburg; the imperial army domineered in Saxony; the Swedish army meeting with no resistance, advanced into the heart of Pomerania; so that the king was not only threatened on every side, but all correspondence between him and his hereditary dominions was at this juncture cut off.

His enemies having been hitherto baffled by his activity and spirit, in their designs upon Silesia, now projected a scheme, the execution of which he could not but feel in the most sensible manner. The Russian army being on its retreat from Silesia, count Czernichew was sent with a strong detachment into the Marche of Brandenburg, while a numerous body of Austrians, under the generals Lacy and Brentano, penetrated into the same country from Saxony, with instructions to join the Russians at the gates of Berlin. The Prussian general Hulsen, finding himself unable to cope with the army of the empire in Misnia, had retired towards this capital, where he was joined by the troops under general Werner, lately returned from Pomerania: but as their forces after this junction did not amount to above fifteen thousand men, and the allies advancing against them consisted of no less than forty thousand, they would not pretend to oppose the enemy in the open field, nor to defend a city of such extent, and so imperfectly fortified. Such an attempt would have not only exposed their troops to ruin, without being able to save the capital; but would have likewise subjected the place to more severe treatment, in consequence of their opposition. They therefore determined to retire, after having repulsed the advanced guard of the Russians under Tottleben, which attacked the gates, and even bombarded the town, before the great armies appeared.

At their approach the Prussian generals retreated, leaving three weak battalions in the place, in order to enable it to obtain some sort of conditions from the enemy. Nevertheless they made no resistance; but on the first summons proposed articles of capitulation, which being rejected, they surrendered themselves prisoners of war. The foreign ministers, however, residing at Berlin, employed their good offices with such zeal and success, that tolerable terms were procured. The inhabitants were indulged with the free exercise of their religion, and an immunity from violence to their persons and effects. The enemy promised that the Russian irregulars should not be touched. These articles being ratified, the Austrian and Russian troops entered the place, where they totally destroyed the magazines, arsenals, and founderies, with an immense quantity of military stores, and a great number of cannon and small arms: then they demanded the immediate payment of eight hundred thousand guilders, and afterwards exacted a contribution of one million nine hundred thousand German crowns. Many outrages were committed by the licentious soldiery, in spite of all the precautions which the officers could take to preserve the most exact discipline. The houses of the private inhabitants were tolerably secured; but the king's palaces were ravaged with the most shocking barbarity. In the royal palace of Charlottenburg they pillaged and spoiled the rich furniture; they defaced and mutilated the valuable pictures and antique statues, collected by cardinal de Polignac, and purchased by the family of Brandenburg. The castle of Schonhausen belonging to the queen, and that of Fredericksfeld the property of the margrave Charles, were robbed of effects to an immense value. The palace of Potsdam was effectually preserved by prince Esterhazy, who would not suffer one article of furniture or ornament to be touched; but desired leave to take one picture of the king, and two of his German flutes, that he might keep them, he said, as memorials of an illustrious prince, whose character he admired, whilst he fought against his arms. The Austrian and Russian troops entered Berlin on the ninth day of October, and quitted it on the thirteenth, on hearing that the king was advancing with great speed to the relief of his capital. In their retreat, by different routes from Brandenburg, they drove away all the cattle and horses they could find, ravaged the country, plundered the inhabitants, and committed many brutal outrages, which no pretence of retaliation could justify or excuse.

The body of Russians which entered Berlin, proceeded from thence into Poland, by the way of Furstenwalde, while the Austrians directed their march towards Saxony, from whence they had advanced into Brandenburg. Mean while the town of Wirtemberg, in that electorate, was subdued by the duke de Deux Ponts, commander of the imperial army, which, in conjunction with the Austrians, reduced likewise the towns of Torgau and Leipzig.

The king of Prussia, in his way through Lusatia, was still watched by count Daun at the head of his grand army, and both crossed the Elbe about the latter end of October. His majesty passed the river at Coswick, where he was joined by the troops under prince Eugene of Wirtemberg and general Hulsen; so that his army was now augmented to eighty thousand fighting men, with whom he determined to strike some stroke of importance. Indeed he was at this time under a necessity of embracing some such expedient. General Laudohn, with a considerable body of Austrians, continued in Silesia; the Russian army still threatened Breslau, the capital of that country. The Imperialists and Austrians had made themselves masters of all the great towns in Saxony, and absolutely commanded on both sides of the Elbe. In the eastern part of Pomerania the Russians had blockaded Colberg by sea and land, seemingly determined to reduce the place, that they might have a sea-port, by which they could be furnished with provision, ammunition, necessaries, and reinforcements, without the trouble and inconvenience of a long and laborious march from the banks of the Vistula.

On the western side of Pomerania the war, which had hitherto languished, was renewed by the Swedes with uncommon vigour. They crossed the river Pene without opposition; and compelling general Stullerheim to retire, advanced as far as Stransberg. That officer, however, having received a reinforcement, attacked a Swedish post at Passelvalik, killed about five hundred of the enemy, and took an equal number, with six pieces of cannon; but he was not strong enough to maintain his ground against their whole army.

Thus

Thus the Prussian monarch saw himself constrained to abandon Silesia, deprived of all the places he held in Saxony, which had been his best resource; and in danger of being driven into his hereditary country of Brandenburg, which was unable either to support, or even recruit his army.

In this emergency he resolved to make one desperate effort against the grand Austrian army, under count Daun, who had passed the Elbe at Torgau, and advanced to Eulenburg, from whence, however, he retreated to his former camp at Torgau, while the king chose his situation between this last place and Schilda. His majesty was fully sensible of the strength, the advantageous posture, and the precautions of mareschal Daun: he could have no hope of drawing that wary commander from his post; and yet he saw a necessity of fighting him even there. The winter was far advanced. His troops were extremely exhausted by long and rapid marches; he had no place for their winter-quarters but his own country, already wasted by the enemy's incursions; and here streightened for subsistence, cut off from all power of recruiting, he was to expect to be attacked, as it were, in a narrow corner, by the combined force of so many powerful and exasperated enemies.

In these circumstances he was resolved to come to a battle. He caused his army to be informed, that he led them to a most desperate attempt; that his affairs required it; and that he was determined to conquer or die in the ensuing engagement. They unanimously answered that they would die along with him.

Animated by this declaration, he began his march on the third day of November; and having taken a resolution as daring as could be dictated by despair, he made all the dispositions with as much skill and foresight as could be suggested by the most guarded prudence. He divided his army into three columns. General Hulsen, with one, was to take the post that lay on the left of the Austrian army, and had orders not to move until he found the rest of the Prussians engaged. General Ziethen was to charge on the right: the great attack in front was to be made by the king in person. His majesty had disposed his force in such a manner, that either his right or left must take the enemy in rear, and close them in, so as to disable them from undertaking any thing against that part where he intended to effect his principal attack.

M. Daun no sooner perceived that the king of Prussia was serious in his resolution of fighting, than, in order to prevent confusion, he sent all his baggage over the Elbe, across which he threw three bridges, to be ready in case a retreat should be found necessary. At the same time he caused Torgau to be evacuated; and then extending his left line to a village called Zinne on the left, he stretched it to another called Groschwitz on the right, supporting the right of his second line upon the Elbe.

In this disposition he was found, when, about two in the afternoon, the king began his attack, and was received with the fire of two hundred pieces of cannon, which were planted along the Austrian front. Three times did the Prussians advance to the charge with incredible courage and resolution; and three times were they repulsed and broken with the most terrible slaughter. The king at length ordered a fresh body of his cavalry to advance, which at first compelled the Austrians to give way: but as fresh reinforcements were continually poured upon that part, this body was in its turn obliged to fall back; and the battle still remained at least doubtful, if not rather inclined against the king of Prussia, whose troops, as they had made the most astonishing efforts, so had they suffered beyond all description. But whilst the Prussians sustained themselves in that quarter with invincible perseverance, general Ziethen, with the right wing, took the enemy in rear, repulsed them, and possessed himself of some eminences, which commanded the whole Austrian army. Encouraged by this success, the Prussian infantry once more advanced, forced several of the enemy's intrenchments, and made way for a new attack of their cavalry, which broke in with irresistible impetuosity upon the Austrians, and threw several bodies of them into irreparable disorder. It was now about nine o'clock; the two armies were involved in pitchy darkness; yet the fire continued without intermission, and the battalions, with a blind rage, discharged at each other, without distinguishing friend from foe.

M. Daun did every thing in the disposition and the action that could be expected from his high character; but he was obliged to yield to the miraculous fortune of the king of Prussia. He received a dangerous wound in the thigh, and was carried from the field; a circumstance that, in all probability, disheartened the troops and hastened the defeat. The command then fell to the count O'Donnel, who finding a great part of his troops in confusion, the night advanced, and the enemy possessed of eminences which commanded his camp, and of which it was in vain to think of dispossessing them, ordered a retreat, which was conducted in this darkness and across the Elbe with wonderful regularity: none were lost in passing the bridges, and far the greater part of their artillery was preserved. The Prussians remained masters of this well fought and bloody field. The darkness hindered them from molesting the enemy's retreat, or improving their victory, which they bought at the expence of ten thousand men killed and wounded, and about fifteen hundred prisoners. But, even with this loss, the advantage was well purchased; it was a necessary and a glorious victory; it re-established the reputation of their arms; it secured their winter-quarters; and put them once more in possession of a great part of Saxony.

Of all the king of Prussia's battles this was probably the most important; and it was that in the conduct of which he discovered the greatest skill, intrepidity, and perseverance. His troops behaved with a firmness which would have done honour to those whom he formerly led into Bohemia. In this action, where they were to surmount every obstacle, and encounter every difficulty and danger in order to attack an army of eighty thousand Austrians, under such an accomplished commander as M. Daun, their number did not amount to above fifty thousand men.

The loss of the Austrians was very great, though the number of killed and wounded was never exactly ascertained. Probably it did not much, if at all, exceed the loss on the side of the victorious army; but the prisoners were far more numerous; two hundred and sixteen officers were taken, among whom were four generals, together with eight thousand of the common men. The king in this battle, in which he every moment exposed his life to the greatest dangers, received a slight contusion in his breast by a musket-shot.

The Swedes, having advanced a good way into Pomerania, returned again to their winter-quarters at Stralsund; and the Russian generals fell back once more towards the Vistula: so that the confederates gained little else in the course of this campaign, but the contributions which they levied in Berlin, and the open country of Brandenburg.

The diet of Poland being convoked in the beginning of October, the king confidently expected they would take some resolution in his favour; but the nobles wisely adhered to their former maxims of a neutrality: and one of the deputies protesting against holding a diet while there were foreign troops in the kingdom, the assembly broke up in a tumultuous manner, even before they had chosen a marshal.

The diet of Sweden, which met about the same period, seemed determined to proceed upon business. They elected count Axel Ferson their grand marshal, in opposition to count Horn, by a great majority; which was an unlucky circumstance for the Prussian interest at Stockholm, inasmuch as the same majority obstinately persisted in opinion that the war should be carried on in the spring with redoubled vigour, and the army in Germany augmented to the number of at least thirty thousand fighting men.

This unfavourable circumstance made but little impression upon the Prussian monarch, who had maintained his ground with equal spirit and success since the beginning of the campaign, and now enjoyed in prospect the benefit of winter, which he is said to have termed his best auxiliary.

The animosity which prevailed between the contending parties was not confined to the operations of war; it broke out likewise in printed declarations, which the belligerent powers dispersed all over Europe. In the beginning of the season the states of the circle of Westphalia had been required by the imperial court to furnish their contingent of troops against the king of Prussia, or to commute for this contingent with a sum of money. In consequence of this demand, some of the Westphalian estates had sent deputies to confer with the assembly of the circle of Cologne; and to these the king signified by a declaration dated at Munster, that as this demand of money, instead of troops, was not less extraordinary than contrary to the constitutions of the empire, should they comply with it, or even continue to assist his enemies either with troops or money, he would consider them as having actually taken part in the war against him and his allies, and treat them accordingly on all occasions.

This intimation, however, seems to have been but little regarded. The duke of Mecklenbourg adhered to the opposite cause; and the elector of Cologne co-operated with the French in their designs against Hanover. By way of retaliation for this partiality, the Prussians ravaged the country of Mecklenbourg, and the Hanoverians raised contributions in the territories of Cologne. The parties thus aggrieved had recourse to complaints and remonstrances. The duke's envoy at Ratisbon delivered a rescript to the imperial ministers, representing, that the Prussian troops under general Werner and colonel de Belling had oppressed his country in the autumn with grievous extortions; that afterwards prince Eugene of Wirtembourg, in the service of Prussia, had demanded an exorbitant quantity of provisions, with some millions of money, and a great number of recruits; or, in lieu of these, that the duke's forces should act under the Prussian banner. He therefore declared, that as the country of Mecklenbourg was impoverished and almost depopulated by these oppressions, the duke would find himself obliged to take measures for the future security of his subjects, if not immediately favoured with such assistance from the court of Vienna as would put a stop to those violent proceedings. This declaration was by some considered as the prelude of his renouncing his engagements with the house of Austria.

As the imperial court had threatened to put the elector of Hanover under the ban of the empire, on account of the hostilities which his troops had committed in the electorate of Cologne, his resident at Ratisbon presented to the ministers who assisted at the diet, a memorial, importing, that the emperor had no power, singly, to subject any prince to the ban, or declare him a rebel; and that, by arrogating such a power, he exposed his authority to the same contempt into which the pope's bulls of excommunication were so justly fallen. With regard to the elector of Cologne, he observed, that this prince was the first who began hostilities, by allowing his troops to act in concert with the French in their invasions of Hanover, and by celebrating with rejoicings the advantages which they had gained in that electorate: he therefore declared to the states of the empire that the best way of protecting their subjects from hostile treatment, would be a strict observation of neutrality in the present disputes of the empire.

This was a strain much more likely to operate upon princes and powers who understood and pursued their own interest, than was the repetition of complaints, equally pathetic and unavailing, uttered by the unfortunate king of Poland, elector of Saxony. The damage done to his capital by the last attempt of the Russians upon that city affected the old king in such a manner, that he published at Vienna an appeal to all the powers of Europe, against the cruel and unprecedented outrages which, he alleged, had been committed by his adversaries in Saxony. His case, it must be owned, was truly deplorable; though perhaps, in justice, it ought only to be considered as the necessary consequence of those dangerous and impolitic engagements which he had originally contracted with the courts of Vienna and Petersburg.

With regard to the neutral powers of Europe, they still seemed to persevere in the same pacific maxims which they had hitherto pursued. The king of Denmark continued to prosecute those plans which he had so wisely projected for increasing the wealth, and promoting the happiness of his subjects; nor did he neglect any opportunity of improving natural knowledge, for the benefit of mankind in general. He employed men of ability, at his own expence, to travel into foreign

foreign countries, and collect the most curious productions for the advancement of natural history: he encouraged the liberal and mechanic arts at home, by munificent rewards and peculiar protection: he invited above a thousand foreigners from Germany to become his subjects, and settle in certain districts of Jutland, which had lain waste above three centuries; and they forthwith began to build villages, and cultivate the lands in the dioceses of Wibourg, Arhous, and Ripen: their travelling expences from Altena to their new settlement were defrayed by the king, who moreover maintained them until the produce of the lands could afford a comfortable subsistence. He likewise bestowed upon each colonist a house, a barn, and a stable, with a certain number of horses and cattle. Finally, this generous patriot having visited these new subjects, who received him with unspeakable emotions of joy and affection, he ordered a considerable sum of money to be distributed among them, as an additional mark of his favour. Such conduct in a prince cannot fail to secure the warmest returns of loyalty and attachment from his people; and the execution of such laudable schemes will transmit his name with honour to the latest posterity.

The Dutch, as usual, adhered to their old maxims of prosecuting every branch of commerce, unmoved alike by the insinuations of France or the remonstrances of Great Britain. The violation of the peace by their subjects in Bengal was no sooner known to the court of London than orders were sent to general Yorke, the English ambassador at the Hague, to demand an explanation. He accordingly delivered a memorial to the States-general, importing, that their High Mightinesses must doubtless be greatly astonished to hear, by the public papers, of the irregularities committed by their subjects in the East Indies; but, that they would be much more amazed on perusing the piece annexed to his memorial, containing a minute account, specified with the strictest regard to the truth, of the irregular conduct observed by the Dutch towards the British subjects in the river of Bengal, at a time when the factors and traders of Holland enjoyed all the sweets of peace, and all the advantages of unmolested commerce; at a time when his Britannic majesty, from his great regard to their High Mightinesses, carefully avoided giving the least umbrage to the subjects of the United Provinces: that the king his sovereign was deeply affected by these outrageous doings and mischievous designs of the Dutch in the East Indies, whose aim was to destroy the British settlements in that country; an aim that would have been accomplished, had not the king's victorious arms brought them to reason, and obliged them to sue for an accommodation: that his majesty would willingly believe their High Mightinesses had given no order for proceeding to such extremities, and that the directors of their India company had no share in the transaction; nevertheless he (the ambassador) was ordered to demand signal satisfaction in the name of the king his master; that all who should be found to have shared in the offence, so manifestly tending to the destruction of the English settlements in that country, should be exemplarily punished; and that their High Mightinesses should confirm the stipulations agreed upon, immediately after the action, by the directors of the respective companies; in consideration of which agreement, the Dutch ships were restored, after their commanders acknowledged their fault, in owning themselves the aggressors.

To this remonstrance the States-general replied, that nothing of what was laid to the charge of their subjects, had yet reached their knowledge; but they requested his Britannic majesty to suspend his judgment, until he should be made perfectly acquainted with the grounds of those disputes; and they promised he should have reason to be satisfied with the exemplary punishment that would be inflicted upon all who should be found concerned in violating the peace between the two nations. As a proof of their regard for the king of Great Britain, they at length agreed, after warm disputes, to the proposed match between the princess Caroline, sister to the prince of Orange, and the prince of Nassau Weilbourg, in consequence of which the nuptials were celebrated at the Hague, in the month of March with great magnificence.

Notwithstanding the prospect of a rupture in Italy, no new incident disturbed the tranquility of the southern parts of Europe. The king of Spain, though warmly importuned by the other branch of the house of Bourbon to engage in the war as its ally, refused to interpose in any other way than as a mediator between the courts of London and Versailles. He sent the Conde de Fuentes, a nobleman of high rank and character, in quality of ambassador extraordinary to the king of Great Britain, in order to offer his good offices for effecting a peace; and the Conde, after having conferred with the English ministry, made an excursion to Paris; but his proposal with respect to a cessation of hostilities, if in reality such a proposal was ever made, did not meet with a favourable reception. He found no difficulty, however, in compromising some other differences that subsisted between the two crowns of Great Britain and Spain. His Catholic majesty wisely persisted in the execution of that patriotic plan which he had hitherto pursued with so much steadiness. In the first place, he spared no pains and application to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the state of his kingdom. He remitted to his people all they owed the crown, amounting to threescore millions of reals: he demanded an exact account of his father's debts, that they might be discharged with the utmost punctuality: an order was sent to the treasury, that ten millions of reals should be annually appropriated for this purpose, until the whole should be liquidated; and, to the first year's payment, he added fifty millions, to be divided equally among the legal claimants. He took measures for the vigorous execution of the laws against offenders, encouraged industry, protected commerce, and felt the exquisite pleasure of being beloved as the father of his people. To give importance to his crown, and encrease his influence among the powers of Europe, he fitted out a powerful squadron of ships at Carthagen, and is said to have declared his intention to employ them against Algiers, should the dey refuse to release the slaves of the Spanish nation.

The commotion excited in Portugal by the late conspiracy had not yet entirely subsided. The pope's nuncio was not only forbid the court, but even even sent under a strong guard to the frontiers: an indignity which induced the pontiff to order the Portuguese minister at Rome to evacuate the ecclesiastical dominions. In the mean time, another embarkation of jesuits was sent from Civita Vecchia; yet the expulsion of these fathers did not restore the internal peace of Portugal, or put an end to the practice of plotting; for, even after their departure, some persons of rank were either committed to close prison, or exiled from the kingdom. The jesuits were not more fortunate in America; for in the month of October, in the foregoing year, an obstinate battle was fought between the united forces of Spain and Portugal, and the Indians of Paraguay, who were under the dominion of the jesuits: victory at length declared in favour of the two crowns; so that the vanquished were obliged to capitulate and lay down their arms. As the court of Portugal had made remonstrances to the British ministry against the proceedings of the English squadron under admiral Boscawen, which had attacked and destroyed some French ships under the Portuguese fort in the bay of Lagos, his Britannic majesty thought proper to send the earl of Kinnoul as ambassador extraordinary to Lisbon, where that nobleman made such excuses for the insult of the English admiral as entirely removed all misunderstanding between the two crowns, and could not fail of being agreeable to the Portuguese monarch, thus respected, soothed, and deprecated by a mighty nation in the very zenith of power and prosperity. On the sixth of June, being the birthday of the king of Portugal, the marriage of his brother Don Pedro with the princess of Brazil, was celebrated in the chapel of the palace where the king resides, to the universal joy of the people, as this match will prevent all disputes with respect to the succession. The nuptials were announced to the public by the discharge of cannon, and celebrated with illuminations, and all kinds of rejoicing.

An incident which happened in the Mediterranean had like to have exposed the knights of the order of Malta to the resentment and indignation of the Ottoman Porte. A large Turkish ship of the line, mounted with sixty-eight brass cannon, having on board a complement of seven hundred men, besides seventy Christian slaves, under the immediate command of the Turkish admiral, had, in company with two frigates, five galleys, and other smaller vessels, sailed in June from the Dardanelles, cruised along the coasts of Smyrna, Scio, and Trio, and at length anchored in the channel of Stangie, where the admiral with four hundred persons went on shore, on the nineteenth day of September. The Christian slaves seizing this opportunity, armed themselves with knives, and fell upon the three hundred that remained with such irresistible fury, that a great number of the Turks were instantly slain: many leaped over board into the sea, where they perished; and the rest sued for mercy. The Christians, having thus secured possession of the ship, hoisted sail and bore away for Malta; which, though chased by the two frigates and a Ragusan ship, they reached by crowding all their canvas, and brought their prize safe into the harbour of Volette, amidst the acclamations of the people.

The order of Malta, as a recompence for this signal act of bravery and resolution, assigned to the captors the whole property of the ship and slaves, together with all the effects on board, including a sum of money, which the Turkish commander had collected by contribution, amounting to a million and an half of florins. The grand signor was so enraged at this event, that he disgraced his admiral, and threatened to take vengeance on the order of Malta, for having detained the ship and countenanced the capture.

Such a dangerous ferment arose at Constantinople, that a revolution was apprehended. Mustapha, the present emperor, had no sons; but his brother Bajazet, whose life he had spared, contrary to the custom of Turkish policy, produced a son by one of the women with whom he was indulged in his confinement; a circumstance which aroused the jealousy of the emperor to such a degree, that he resolved to dispatch his brother. The great officers of the Porte opposed this design, which was so disagreeable to the people, that an insurrection ensued. Several Turks and Armenians taking it for granted that a revolution was at hand, bought up great quantities of grain, and a dreadful dearth was the consequence of this monopoly. The sultan assembled the troops, quieted the insurgents, ordered the engrossers of corn to be executed, and in a little time the repose of the city was re-established. Let us now return to the affairs of Great Britain.

Great expectations were formed in England this year from the prodigious increase of the navy, which at this juncture amounted to one hundred and twenty ships of the line, besides frigates, fire-ships, sloops, bombs, and tenders. Of these capital ships seventeen were stationed in the East Indies, twenty for the defence of the West Indian islands, twelve in North America, ten in the Mediterranean, and sixty-one, either on the coast of France, in the harbours of England, or cruising in the English seas for the protection of the British commerce. Notwithstanding these numerous and powerful armaments, the enemy, who had not a ship of the line at sea, were so alert with their small privateers and armed vessels, that in the beginning of this year, from the first of March to the tenth of June they had made prize of two hundred vessels belonging to Great Britain and Ireland. The whole number of British ships taken by them, from the first day of June in the year 1756, to the first of June in the present year, amounted to two thousand five hundred and thirty-nine; of these seventy-eight were privateers, three hundred and twenty-one were retaken, and about the same number ransomed. In the same space of time the British cruisers had made captures of nine hundred forty-four vessels, including two hundred forty-two privateers, many fishing boats and small coasters; the acquisition of which was not of so great consequence by their intrinsic value, as by depriving the enemy of an additional number of their sailors. That such a small proportion of ships should be taken from the French during this period will not appear surprising, when we consider the terrible shock their commerce had antecedently sustained, and the great number of their mariners that were previously imprisoned in England, and who by this time amounted to little less than twenty thousand.

The present year, it must be owned, was not so fruitful in naval events as the former: nevertheless it was distinguished by some gallant exploits, which reflected great honour on our sea commanders. I have, in recording the transactions of the preceding year, mentioned a small armament equipped at Dunkirk, under the command of M. de Thurot, who, in spite of all the vigilance of the British commander stationed in the Downs, found means to escape from the harbour in the month of October last, and arrived at Gottenburgh in Sweden, from whence he proceeded to Bergen in Norway. His instructions were to make occasional descents upon the coast of Ireland, and by dividing the troops, and distracting the attention of the government in that kingdom, to facilitate the enterprize of M. de Conflans, the fate of which I have already narrated. The original armament of Thurot consisted of five ships, one of which, called the Mareschal Belleisle, was mounted with forty-four guns; the Begon, the Blond, the Terpsichore, had thirty guns each, and the Marante carried twenty-four. The number of soldiers put on board this little fleet did not exceed one thousand two hundred and seventy, exclusive of mariners, to the number of seven hundred; besides two hundred of the troops were sent sick on shore, before the armament sailed from Dunkirk; and in their voyage between Gottenburgh and Bergen they lost company of the Begon, during a violent storm. The severity of the weather detained them nineteen days at Bergen, at the expiration of which they set sail for the northern part of Ireland in the latter end of January.

The intention of Thurot was to make a descent about Derry; but before this design could be executed, the weather growing tempestuous, and the wind blowing off shore, they were driven out to sea, and in the night lost sight of the Marante, which never joined them in the sequel. After having been tempest beaten for some time, and exposed to a very scanty allowance of provision, the officers requested of Thurot that he would return to France, lest they should all perish by famine; but he lent a deaf ear to their proposal, and frankly told them he could not return to France without having struck some stroke for the service of his country. Nevertheless, in hope of meeting with some refreshment, he steered to the island of Isla, where the troops were landed; and here they found black cattle and a small supply of oatmeal, for which they paid a reasonable price; and it must be owned Thurot himself behaved with great moderation and generosity.

While this gallant adventurer struggled with these numerous difficulties, his arrival in the British seas filled the whole kingdom with alarm. Bodies of regular troops and militia were posted along the coasts of Ireland and Scotland; and besides the squadron of commodore Boys, who sailed to the northward on purpose to pursue the enemy, other ships of war were ordered to scour the Bristol Channel, and cruize between Scotland and Ireland. The weather no sooner permitted Thurot to pursue his destination, than he sailed from Isla to the bay of Carrickfergus in Ireland, and made all the necessary preparations for a descent, which was accordingly effected, with six hundred men, on the twenty-first day of February. Lieutenant-colonel

Jennings, who commanded four companies of raw undisciplined men at Carrickfergus, having received information that three ships had anchored about two miles and a half from the castle, which was ruinous and defenceless, immediately detached a party to make observations, and ordered the French prisoners there confined to be removed to Belfast.

Mean while the enemy landing without opposition, advanced towards the town, which they found as well guarded as the nature of the place (which was entirely open) and the circumstances of the English commander would admit. A regular attack was carried on, and a spirited defence made, until the ammunition of the English failed; then colonel Jennings retired in order to the castle, which however was in all respects untenable; for, besides a breach in the wall near fifty feet wide, they found themselves destitute of provision and ammunition. Nevertheless, they repulsed the assailants in their first attack, even after the gate was burst open, and supplied the want of shot with stones and rubbish. At length, the colonel and his troops were obliged to surrender, on condition that they should not be sent prisoners to France, but be ransomed by sending thither an equal number of French prisoners from Great Britain or Ireland; that the castle should not be demolished, nor the town of Carrickfergus plundered or burned, on condition that the mayor and corporation should furnish the French troops with necessary provisions.

The enemy, after this exploit, did not venture to advance farther into the country; a step which indeed they could not have taken with any regard to their own safety; for by this time a considerable body of regular troops was collected, and the people of the country manifested a laudable spirit of loyalty and resolution, crowding in great numbers to Belfast, to offer their service against the invaders. These circumstances, of which the enemy were fully apprized, and the defeat of Conflans, which they had also learned, obliged them to abandon their conquest, and reembark with some precipitation, after having laid Carrickfergus under moderate contribution.

The fate they escaped on shore they soon met with at sea. Captain John Elliot, who commanded three frigates at Kinsale, and had, in the course of this war, already signalized himself by extraordinary acts of valour, was informed by a dispatch from the duke of Bedford, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, that three of the enemy's ships lay at anchor in the bay of Carrickfergus, and thither he immediately steered his course in the ship Æolus, accompanied by the Pallas and Brilliant, under the command of the captains Clements and Logie. On the twenty-eighth day of February they discovered the enemy, and gave chase, in sight of the Isle of Man; and about nine in the morning captain Elliot, in his own ship, attacked the Belleisle, commanded by Thurot, although considerably his superior in strength of men, number of guns, and weight of metal. In a few minutes his consorts were also engaged with the other two ships of the enemy. After a warm action maintained with great spirit on all sides for an hour and a half, captain Elliot's lieutenant boarded the Belleisle, and, striking her colours with his own hand, the commander submitted. His example was immediately followed by the other French captains; and the English commodore taking possession of his prizes, conveyed them to the Isle of Man that their damage might be repaired.

Though the Belleisle was very leaky, and had lost her bolt-sprit, mizen-mast, and main-yard, in all probability the victory would not have been so easily purchased, had not the gallant Thurot fallen during the action. The victor had not even the consolation to perform the last offices to his brave enemy; for his body was thrown into the sea by his own people in the hurry of the engagement. The loss on the side of the English did not exceed forty men killed and wounded; whereas three hundred of the enemy were slain or disabled.

The service performed on this occasion was deemed so essential to the peace and commerce of Ireland, that the thanks of the house of commons in that kingdom were voted to the conquerors of Thurot, as well as to lieutenant-colonel Jennings, for his spirited behaviour at Carrickfergus: and the freedom of the city of Cork was presented in silver boxes to the captains Elliot, Clements, and Logie. The name of Thurot was become terrible to all the trading sea-ports of Britain and Ireland; and therefore the defeat and capture of his squadron were celebrated with as hearty rejoicings as could have been produced by the most important victory.

In the beginning of April another engagement between four frigates, still more equally matched, had a different issue, though not less honourable to the British commanders. Captain Skinner of the Biddeford, and captain Kennedy of the Flamborough, both frigates, sailed on a cruise from Lisbon, and on the fourth day of April came up with two large French frigates, convoy to a fleet of merchant ships, which the English captains immediately resolved to attack. The enemy did not decline the engagement, which began about half an hour after six in the evening, and was continued with great fury till eleven. By this time the Flamborough had lost sight of the Biddeford, and the frigate with which captain Kennedy was engaged bore away with all the sail she could carry. He pursued her till noon the next day, when she had left him so far astern, that he lost sight of her, and returned to Lisbon with the loss of fifteen men killed and wounded, including the lieutenant of marines, and considerable damage in her hull and rigging. In three days he was joined by the Biddeford, which had also compelled her antagonist to give way, and pursued her till she was out of sight. In about an hour after the action began, captain Skinner was killed by a cannon-ball; and the command devolved to lieutenant Knollis, son to the earl of Banbury†, who maintained the battle with great spirit, even after he was wounded, until he received a second shot in his body, which proved mortal. Then the master assuming the direction, continued the engagement with equal resolution, until the enemy made his escape, which he the more easily accomplished, as the Biddeford was disabled in her masts and rigging.

No action of importance was in the course of this year performed by the naval forces of Great Britain in the seas of Europe. A powerful squadron still remained in the bay of Quiberon, in order to amuse and employ a body of French forces on that part of the coast, interrupt the navigation of the enemy, and at the same time to watch the motions of those few French ships which had run into the river Villaine, after the defeat of Conflans. The fleet employed on this service was alternately commanded by admiral Boscawen and sir Edward Hawke; the former of whom took possession of a small island near the river Vannes, which he caused to be cultivated and planted with vegetables for the use of the men infected with scorbutic disorders, arising from salt provisions, sea air, and want of proper exercise. In the month of September sir Edward Hawke, who had by this time relieved Mr. Boscawen, detached the gallant lord Howe in the Magnanime, with the ships Prince Frederick and Bedford, to reduce the little island of Dumet, about three miles in length and two in breadth, abounding with fresh water. It was defended by a small fort mounted with nine cannon, and garrisoned by one company of the regiment of Bourbon, who surrendered in a very short time after the ships had begun the attack. By this small conquest a considerable expence was saved to the nation in the article of transports employed to carry water for the use of the squadron.

Admiral Rodney still maintained his former station off the harbour of Havre de Grace, in order to overawe the enemy on that part of the coast. In the month of July, while he hovered in this neighbourhood, five large flat-bottomed boats, loaded with cannon and shot, set sail from Harfleur in the middle of the day, with their colours flying, as if they had set the English squadron at defiance; for the walls of Havre de Grace, and even the adjacent hills, were lined with spectators, assembled to behold the issue of this adventure. Having reached the river of Caen, they stood backwards and forwards upon the shoals, intending to amuse Mr. Rodney till night, and then proceed under the cover of darkness. He perceived their drift, and gave directions to his small vessels to be ready, that as soon as day-light failed, they should make all the sail they could for the mouth of the river Orne, with a view to cut off the enemy's retreat, while he himself stood in with the larger ships to the steep coast of Port Brassin. The scheme succeeded to his wish. The enemy seeing their retreat cut off, ran ashore at Port Brassin, where the admiral destroyed them, together with the small fort which had been erected for the defence of the harbour. Each of those vessels was one hundred feet in length, capable of containing four hundred men for a short passage. What their destination was, we cannot pretend to determine: but the French had provided a great number of these transports; for ten escaped into the river Orne leading to Caen; and in consequence of this disaster, one hundred were unloaded and sent up again to Rouen.

† Five sons of this nobleman distinguished themselves remarkably in the course of this war. The fourth and fifth were dangerously wounded at the battle of Minden; the second was hurt in the reduction of Guadalupe: lord Wallingford, the eldest, received a shot at Carrickfergus; and the third was slain in this engagement.

Nor was this the only damage which the enemy suffered on this part of their coast. In the month of November captain Ourry, of the Acæton, chased a large privateer, and drove her on shore between Cape Barfleur and La Hogue, where she perished. The cutters belonging to Mr. Rodney's squadron scoured the coast towards Dieppe, where a considerable fishery was carried on, and where they took or destroyed near forty vessels of considerable burthen. Though the English navy suffered nothing from the French during this period, it sustained some damage from the weather. The Conqueror, a new ship of the line, was lost in the Channel on the island of St. Nicholas; but the crew and cannon were saved. The Lyme, of twenty guns, foundered in the Cattegat in Norway, and fifty of the men perished; and in the West Indies a tender belonging to the Dublin, commanded by commodore sir James Douglas, was lost in a gale of wind, with an hundred chosen mariners.

Of the domestic transactions relating to the war, the most important was the fitting out a powerful armament destined for some secret expedition. A numerous body of forces was assembled, and a great number of transports collected at Portsmouth. Generals were nominated to the command of this enterprize. The troops were actually embarked, with a great train of artillery; and the eyes of the whole nation were attentively fixed upon this armament, which could not have been prepared without incurring a very considerable expence. Notwithstanding these preparations, no enterprize of importance was undertaken; and in the latter end of the year the expedition was wholly laid aside. The people did not fail to clamour against the inactivity of the summer; and it must be owned their complaints were not entirely without foundation: but in all probability the design of the armament was either to intimidate the French into proposals of peace, to make a diversion from the Rhine, by alarming the coast of Bretagne, or to throw over a body of troops into Flanders, to effect a junction with the hereditary prince of Brunswick, who, at the head of twenty thousand men, had made an irruption as far as the Lower Rhine, and even crossed that river.

The only considerable damage sustained by the navy of Great Britain since the commencement of this year, was the loss of the Ramillies, a magnificent ship of the second rate, belonging to the squadron which admiral Boscawen commanded on the coast of France, in order to watch the motions and distress the commerce of that restless enterprising enemy. In the beginning of February a series of stormy weather obliged the admiral to return from the bay of Quiberon to Plymouth, where he arrived with much difficulty; but the Ramillies overshot the entrance to the Sound, and being embayed near a point called the Bolt-head, about four leagues higher up the Channel, was dashed in pieces among the rocks, after all her anchors and cables had given way. All her officers and men, amounting to seven hundred, perished on this occasion, except one midshipman and twenty-five mariners, who had the good fortune to save themselves by leaping on the rocks, as the hull was thrown forwards, and raised up by the succeeding billows.

Having thus given a circumstantial account of the most remarkable events that happened in the British dominions and the European seas in the course of this summer, we must now turn our eyes to the continent of North America, which, as the theatre of war, still maintained its former importance. The French emissaries from the province of Louisiana had exercised their arts of insinuation with such success among the Cherokees, a numerous and powerful nation of the Indians, settled on the confines of Virginia and Carolina, that they had infringed the peace with the English towards the latter end of the last year, and begun hostilities by plundering, massacring, and scalping several British subjects of the more southern provinces. Mr. Lyttleton, governor of South Carolina, having received information of these outrages, obtained the necessary aids from the assembly of his province, for maintaining a considerable body of forces, which was raised with great expedition. He marched in the beginning of October at the head of eight hundred provincials, reinforced with three hundred regular troops, and penetrated into the heart of the country possessed by the Cherokees, who were so much intimidated by his vigour and dispatch, that they sent a deputation of their chiefs to sue for peace, which was re-established by a new treaty, dictated by the English governor. They obliged themselves to renounce the French interest; to deliver up all the spies and emissaries of that nation, then resident among them; to surrender to justice those of their own people who had been concerned in murdering and scalping the British subjects; and for the performance of these articles two and twenty of their head men were put as hostages into the hands of the governor.

So entirely regardless, however, were these treacherous barbarians of this solemn accommodation, that Mr. Lyttleton had hardly returned from their country, when they attempted to surprize the English fort at Prince George, near the frontiers of Carolina, by going thither in a body, on pretence of delivering up some murderers. This attempt was conducted in the following manner, having doubtless been concerted with the two and twenty hostages who resided in the fort. On the sixteenth day of February two Indian women appearing at Keowee, on the other side of the river, Mr. Dogharty, one of the officers of the fort, went out to ask them what news. While he was engaged in conversation with these females, the great Indian warrior Ouconnostata joining them, desired he would call the commanding officer, to whom he said he had something to propose. Accordingly, lieutenant Cotymore appearing, accompanied by ensign Bell, Dogharty, and Forster the interpreter, Ouconnostata told him he had something of consequence to impart to the governor, whom he purposed to visit, and desired he might be attended by a white man as a safeguard. The lieutenant assuring him he should have a safeguard, the Indian declared he would then go and catch a horse for him; so saying, he swung a bridle thrice over his head as a signal, and immediately twenty-five or thirty muskets, from different ambuscades, were discharged at the English officers. Mr. Cotymore received a shot in his left breast, and and in a few days expired; Mr. Bell was wounded in the calf of the leg, and the interpreter in the buttock.

Ensign Milne, who remained in the fort, was no sooner informed of this treachery than he ordered the soldiers to shackle the hostages; in the execution of which order one man was killed on the spot, and another wounded in the forehead with a tomahawk: circumstances which, added to the murder of the lieutenant, incensed the garrison to such a degree, that it was judged absolutely necessary to put the hostages to death without farther hesitation. In the evening a party of Indians approaching the fort, and firing two signal-pieces, cried aloud in the Cherokee language, "Fight manfully, and you shall be assisted." Then they began an attack, and continued firing all night upon the fort, without doing the least execution.

That a design was concerted between them and the hostages, appeared plainly from the nature of this assault; and this supposition was converted into a certainty next day, when some of the garrison searching the apartment in which the hostages lay, found a bottle of poison, probably designed to be emptied into the well, and several tomahawks buried in the earth; which weapons had been privately conveyed to them by their friends, who were permitted to visit them without interruption. On the third day of March the fort at Ninety-Six was attacked by two hundred Cherokee Indians, with musquetry, which had little or no effect; so that they were forced to retire with some loss, and revenged themselves on the open country, burning and ravaging all the houses and plantations belonging to the English settlers in this part of the country, and all along the frontiers of Virginia. Not contented with pillaging and destroying the habitations, they wantoned in the most horrible barbarities; and their motions were so secret and sudden, that it was impossible for the inhabitants to know where the storm would burst, or take proper precautions for their own defence, so that a great number of the back settlements were totally abandoned.

The Indians, disappointed in their design upon Fort Prince George, wreaked their vengeance upon the English subjects trading in their country, all of whom they butchered without mercy. Not contented with this barbarous sacrifice, they made incursions into the British settlements at the Long Lanes, and the forks of the Broad River, and massacred about forty defenceless colonists, who reposed themselves in full security on the peace so lately ratified. As views of interest could not have induced them to act in this manner, and their revenge had not been inflamed by any fresh provocation, these violences were naturally imputed to the instigation of French incendiaries; and too plainly evinced the necessity of crowning our American conquests with the reduction of Louisiana, from whence these emissaries were undoubtedly dispatched.

The horrible cruelties which the Cherokees committed upon their renewal of hostilities, alarmed all the southern colonies of the English; and application was made for assistance to Mr. Amherst, the commander in chief of the king's forces in America. He forthwith detached twelve hundred chosen men to South Carolina, under the command of colonel Montgomery, brother to the earl of Eglinton, an officer of approved conduct and distinguished gallantry. Immediately after his arrival at Charles Town, he advanced to Ninety-Six, and proceeded to Twelve Mile River, which he passed in the beginning of June without opposition. He prosecuted his route by forced marches, until he arrived in the neighbourhood of the Indian town called Keowee, where he encamped in an advantageous situation. Having reason to believe the enemy were not yet apprised of his coming, he resolved to rush upon them in the night by surprise.

With this view, leaving his tents standing, with a sufficient guard for the camp and waggons, he marched through the woods towards the Cherokee town of Estatoe, at the distance of twenty-five miles, and in his route detached a company of light infantry to destroy the village of Little Keowee, where they were received with a smart fire; but they rushed in with their bayonets, and all the men were put to the sword. The main body proceeded straight to Estatoe, which they reached in the morning; but it had been abandoned about half an hour before their arrival. Some few of the Indians who had not time to escape were slain; and the town, consisting of two hundred houses, well stored with provision, ammunition, and all the necessaries of life, was first plundered, and then reduced to ashes; some of the wretched inhabitants who concealed themselves perishing in the flames. It was necessary to strike a terror into those savages by some examples of severity; and the soldiers became deaf to all the suggestions of mercy, when they found in one of the Indian towns the body of an Englishman, whom they had put to the torture that very morning.

Colonel Montgomery followed his blow with surprising rapidity. In the space of a few hours he destroyed Sugar Town, which was as large as Estatoe, and every village and house in the lower nation. The Indian villages in this part of the world were agreeably situated, generally consisting of about one hundred houses, neatly and commodiously built, and well supplied with provision. They had in particular large magazines of corn, which were consumed in the flames. All the men that were taken suffered immediate death; but the greater part of the nation had escaped with the utmost precipitation. In many houses the beds were yet warm, and the tables spread with victuals. Many loaded guns went off while the houses were burning. The savages had not time to save their most valuable effects. The soldiers found some money, three or four watches, a good quantity of wampum, cloaths, and peltry.

Colonel Montgomery, having thus taken vengeance on the perfidious Cherokees, at the expence of five or six men killed or wounded, returned to fort Prince George, with about forty Indian women and children whom he had made prisoners. Two of their warriors were set at liberty, and desired to inform their nation, that though they were now in the power of the English, they might still, on their submission, enjoy the blessing of peace. As the chief, called Attakullakulla, alias the Little Carpenter, who had signed the last treaty, disapproved of the proceedings of his countrymen, and had done many good offices to the English, since the renovation of the war, he was now given to under-understand, that he might come down with some other chiefs to treat of an accommodation, which would be granted to the Cherokees on his account; but that the negociation must be begun in a few days, otherwise all the towns in the upper nation would be ravaged and reduced to ashes.

These intimations having produced little or no effect, colonel Montgomery determined to make a second irruption into the middle settlements of the Cherokees, and began his march on the twenty-fourth day of June. On the twenty-seventh, captain Morison, of the advanced party, was killed by a shot from a thicket, and the firing became so troublesome that his men gave way. The grenadiers and light infantry detached to sustain them, continued to advance notwithstanding their fire from the woods, until from a rising ground they discovered a body of the enemy. These they immediately attacked, and obliged to retire into a swamp, which, when the rest of the troops came up, they were, after a short resistance, compelled to abandon: but as the country was difficult, and the path extremely narrow, the forces suffered on their march from the fire of scattered parties, who concealed themselves behind trees and bushes.

At length they arrived at the town of Etchowee, which the inhabitants had forsaken, after having removed every thing of value. Here, while the army encamped on a small plain surrounded by hills, it was incommoded by volleys from the enemy, which wounded some men, and killed several horses. They were even so daring as to attack the piquet guard, which repulsed them with difficulty; but, generally speaking, their parties declined an open engagement. Colonel Montgomery sensible, that as many horses were killed or disabled, he could not proceed farther without leaving his provisions behind, or abandoning the wounded men to the brutal revenge of a savage enemy, resolved to return, and began his march in the night, that he might be the less disturbed by the Indians. Accordingly he pursued his route for two days without interruption; but afterwards sustained some straggling fires from the woods, though the parties of the enemy were put to flight as often as they appeared. In the beginning of July he arrived at Fort Prince George; this expedition having cost him about seventy men killed and wounded, including five officers.

The Cherokees, rather provoked than intimidated by this severe chastisement, assembled to a considerable number, and formed the blockade of Fort Loudoun, a small fortification near the confines of Virginia, defended by an inconsiderable garrison, ill supplied with provision and necessities. After having sustained a long siege, and being reduced to the utmost distress, captain Demere, the commander, held a council of war with the other officers, to deliberate upon their present situation; when it appeared that their provisions were intirely exhausted: that they had subsisted a considerable time, without bread, upon horse-flesh, and such supplies of pork and beans as the Indian women could introduce by stealth: that the men were so weakened with famine and fatigue, that in a little time they would not be able to do duty: that for two nights past, considerable parties had deserted, and some thrown themselves upon the mercy of the enemy: that the garrison in general threatened to abandon their officers, and betake themselves to the woods: and that there was no prospect of relief, their communication having been long cut off from all the British settlements. For these reasons they were unanimously of opinion, that it was impracticable to prolong their defence; that they should accept of an honourable capitulation; and that captain Stuart should be sent to treat with the warriors, and the head men of the Cherokees, about the conditions of their surrender. This officer, being accordingly dispatched with full powers, obtained a capitulation of the Indians, by which the garrison was permitted to retire. The Indians requested, that, when they arrived at Keowee, the Cherokee prisoners confined at that place should be released, all hostilities cease, a lasting accommodation be re-established, and a regular trade revived. In consequence of this treaty the garrison evacuated the fort, and had marched about fifteen miles on their return to Carolina, when they were surrounded and surprised by a large body of Indians, who massacred all the officers, except captain Stuart, and slew five-and-twenty of the soldiers: the rest were made prisoners, and distributed among the different towns and villages of the nation. Captain Stuart owed his life to the generous intercession of the Little Carpenter, who ransomed him at the price of all he could command, and conducted him safe to Holston River, where he found major Lewes advanced so far with a body of Virginians.

In the mean time the British interest and empire were firmly established on the banks of the Ohio, by the prudent conduct of major-general Stanwix, who had passed the winter at Pittsburgh, formerly Duquesne, and employed that time in the most effectual manner for the service of his country. He repaired the fortifications of the place, established posts of communication from the Ohio to the Monongahela, mounted the bastions that cover the isthmus with artillery, erected casemates, storehouses, and barracks for a numerous garrison, and cultivated with equal diligence and success the friendship and alliance of the Indians. The happy consequences of these measures were soon apparent in the production of a considerable trade between the natives and the merchants of Pittsburgh, and in the perfect security of about four thousand settlers, who now returned to the quiet possession of the lands, from whence they had been driven by the enemy, on the frontiers of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia.

The success of the British arms was still more remarkable in the northern parts of this great continent. I have already observed, that brigadier general Murray was left to command the garrison of Quebec, amounting to about six thousand men; that a strong squadron of ships was stationed at Halifax in Nova Scotia, under the direction of lord Colvil, an able and experienced officer, who had instructions to revisit Quebec in the beginning of summer, as soon as the river St. Laurence should be navigable; and that general Amherst, the commander in chief of the forces in America, wintered in New York, that he might be at hand to assemble his troops in the spring, and recommence his operations for the entire reduction of Canada.

General Murray neglected no step that could be taken by the most vigilant officer for maintaining the important conquest of Quebec, and subduing all the Lower Canada. He repaired, during the winter, about five hundred houses which had been damaged by the English cannon, built eight redoubts of wood, raised foot-banks along the ramparts, opened embrasures, mounted artillery, blocked up all the avenues of the suburbs with a stockade, removed eleven months provisions into the highest part of the city, and formed a magazine of four thousand fascines. Two hundred men were posted at St. Foix, and twice the number at Lorette. Several hundred men marched to St. Augustin, brought off the enemy's advanced guard, with a great number of cattle, and disarmed the inhabitants. By these precautions the motions of the French were observed, the avenues of Quebec were covered, and the British dominion secured over eleven parishes, which furnished them with some fresh provision and other necessaries for subsistence. Sixteen thousand cords of wood being wanted for the hospitals, guards, and quarters, and the method of transporting it from the isle of Orleans being found slow and difficult, on account of the floating ice in the river, a sufficient number of hand sledges was made, and two hundred wood-fellers set at work in the forest of St. Foix, where plenty of fuel was obtained, and brought into the several regiments by the men that were not upon duty. A detachment of two hundred men being sent to the other side of the river, disarmed the inhabitants, and compelled them to take the oath of allegiance. By this step the English became masters of the southern side of the river St. Lawrence, and were supplied with good quantities of fresh provision.

The advanced posts of the enemy were established at Point Au Tremble, St. Augustin, and Le Calvaire: the main body of their army quartered between Trois Rivières and Jaques Quartier. Their general having formed the design of attacking Quebec in the winter, began to provide snow shoes or rackets, scaling-ladders, and fascines, and make all the necessary preparations for that enterprise. He took possession of Point Levi, where he formed a magazine of provisions, great part of which, however, fell into the hands of the English; for as soon as the river was froze over, brigadier Murray dispatched thither two hundred men, at whose approach the enemy abandoned their magazine, and retreated with great precipitation. Here the detachment took post in a church, until they could build two wooden redoubts, and mount them with artillery. In the mean time, the enemy returning with a greater force to recover the post, some battalions, with the light infantry, marched over the ice, in order to cut off their communication: but they fled in great confusion, and afterwards took post at St. Michael, at a considerable distance farther down the river. They now resolved to postpone the siege of Quebec, that they might carry it on in a more regular manner. They began to rig their ships, repair their small craft, build galleys, cast bombs and bullets, and prepare fascines and gabions; while brigadier Murray employed his men in making preparations for a vigorous defence. He sent out a detachment, who surprised the enemy's posts at St. Augustin, Maison Brulee, and Le Calvaire, where they took ninety prisoners. He afterwards ordered the light infantry to possess and fortify Cape Rouge, to prevent the enemy's landing at that place, as well as to be nearer at hand to observe their motions; but when the frost broke up, so that their ships could fall down the river, they landed at St. Augustin, and the English posts were abandoned one after another, the detachments retiring without loss into the city.

Mean while the garrison within the walls of Quebec suffered greatly from the excessive cold in the winter, and the want of vegetables and fresh provision, insomuch that, before the end of April, one thousand soldiers were dead of the scurvy, and twice that number rendered unfit for service. Such was the situation of the garrison, when Mr. Murray received undoubted intelligence that the French commander, the chevalier de Levy, was employed in assembling his army, which had been cantoned in the neighbourhood of Montreal; that from the inhabitants of the country he had completed his eight battalions, regimented forty companies of the colonists, and determined to undertake the siege of Quebec, whenever the river St. Lawrence should be so clear of ice that he could use his four frigates, and other vessels, by means of which he would be entirely master of the river.

The brigadier, perceiving that the city of Quebec was no other than a strong cantonment, had projected a plan of defence, by extending lines, and intrenching his troops on the Heights of Abraham, which, at the distance of eight hundred paces, entirely command the ramparts of the city, and might have been defended by a small force against a formidable army. Fascines, and every other necessary for this work, had been provided, and in the month of April the men were set at work upon the projected lines; but the earth was so hardened by the frost, that it was found impracticable to proceed. Being informed, on the night of the twenty-sixth, that the enemy had landed at Point au Tremble, to the number of ten thousand men, with five hundred savages, he ordered all the bridges over the river Caprouge to be broke down, secured the landing-places at Syl-leri and the Foulon; and next day, marching in person with a strong detachment and two field-pieces, took possession of an advantageous situation, and thus defeated the scheme which the French commander had laid for cutting off the posts which the English had established. These being all withdrawn, the brigadier that same afternoon marched back to Quebec with little or no loss, although his rear was harassed by the enemy. Here he formed a resolution, which hath been censured by some critics in war as a measure that favoured more of youthful impatience and overboiling courage, than of that military discretion which ought to distinguish a commander in such a delicate situation: but it is more easy to blame with an appearance of reason than to act in such circumstances with any certainty of success.

Mr. Murray, in his letter to the secretary of state, declared, that although the enemy were greatly superior to him in number, yet, when he considered that the English forces were habituated to victory; that they were provided with a fine train of field artillery; that, in shutting them up at once

once within the walls, he should have risked his whole stake on the single chance of defending a wretched fortification; a chance which could not be much lessened by an action in the field, though such an action would double the chance of success: for these reasons he had determined to hazard a battle: should the event prove unprosperous, he resolved to hold out the place to the last extremity; then to retreat to the isle of Orleans or Coudres with the remainder of the garrison, and there wait for a reinforcement.

In pursuance of these resolutions he gave the necessary orders over night, and on the twenty-eighth day of April, at half an hour after six in the morning, marched out with his little army of three thousand men, which he formed on the heights in order of battle. The right brigade, commanded by colonel Burton, consisted of the regiments of Amherst, Anstruther, Webb, and the second battalion of royal Americans: the left, under colonel Fraser, was formed of the regiments of Kennedy, Lascelles, Townshend, and the Highlanders. Otway's regiment, and the third battalion of royal Americans, constituted the corps de reserve. Major Dalling's corps of light infantry covered the right flank; the left was secured by captain Huzzen's company of rangers, and one hundred volunteers, under the command of captain Macdonald; and each battalion was supplied with two field-pieces.

Brigadier Murray having reconnoitred the enemy, perceived their van had taken possession of the rising grounds about three quarters of a mile in his front; but that their army was on the march in one column. Thinking this was the critical moment to attack them before they were formed, he advanced towards them with equal order and expedition. They were soon driven from the Heights, though not without a warm dispute; during which the body of their army advanced at a round pace, and formed in columns. Their van consisted of ten companies of grenadiers, two of volunteers, and four hundred savages: eight battalions, formed in four columns, with some bodies of Canadians in the intervals, constituted their main body: their rear was composed of two battalions and some Canadians in the flanks; and two thousand Canadians formed the reserve. Their whole army amounted to about thirteen thousand men.

Major Dalling, with great gallantry, dispossessed their grenadiers of a house and windmill, which they occupied, in order to cover the left flank; and in this attack the major and some of his officers were wounded: nevertheless, the light infantry pursued the fugitives to a corps which was formed to sustain them; then the pursuers halted, and dispersed along the front of the right: a circumstance, which prevented that wing from taking advantage of the first impression they had made on the left of the enemy. The light infantry being ordered to regain the flank, were, in attempting this motion, furiously charged and thrown into disorder; then they retired to the rear in such a shattered condition, that they could never again be brought up during the whole action. Otway's regiment was instantly ordered to advance from the body of reserve, and sustain the right wing, which the enemy twice in vain attempted to penetrate. Mean while the left brigade of the British forces did not remain inactive: they had dispossessed the French of two redoubts, and sustained with undaunted resolution the whole efforts of the enemy's right, until they were fairly fought down, overpowered by numbers, and reduced to an handful, notwithstanding the assistance they received from the third battalion of Royal Americans, which had been stationed with the body of reserve, as well as from Kennedy's regiment posted in the center. The French attacked with great impetuosity; and, at length, a fresh column of the regiment de Roussillon, penetrating the left wing of the British army, it gave way: the disorder was soon communicated to the right, so that, after a very obstinate dispute, which lasted an hour and three quarters, brigadier Murray was obliged to abandon the field, with the loss of one thousand men killed or wounded, and the greater part of his artillery. The enemy lost twice the number of men, and reaped no essential advantage from their victory.

Mr. Murray, far from being dispirited by this defeat, was only thereby animated to a more vigorous defence of the place which had been intrusted to his care. He resolved to prosecute the fortifications of Quebec, which had been interrupted by the severity of the winter; and the soldiers exerted themselves with incredible activity, not only in labouring at the works, but also in the defence of the town, before which the enemy had opened trenches on the very evening of the battle. Three ships anchored at a small distance below their camp; and for several days they were employed in landing their cannon, mortars, and ammunition. Mean while they worked incessantly at their trenches before the town; and, on the eleventh day of May, opened one bomb battery, and three batteries of cannon. Brigadier Murray made the necessary dispositions for holding out the place to the last extremity: he raised two cavaliers, contrived some outworks, and planted the ramparts with one hundred and thirty-two pieces of artillery, dragged thither mostly by the soldiery. Though the enemy cannonaded the place with great vivacity the first day, their fire soon slackened, and their batteries were, in a manner, silenced by the superior fire of the garrison; nevertheless Quebec would, in all probability, have fallen into their hands, had a French fleet from Europe got the start of an English squadron in sailing up the river.

Lord Colville had departed from Halifax, with the fleet under his command, on the twenty-second day of April; but was retarded in his passage by thick fogs, contrary winds, and great shoals of ice floating down the river. Commodore Swanton, who had sailed from England with a small reinforcement, arrived about the beginning of May at the isle of Bec, in the river St. Laurence, where, with two ships, he purposed to wait for the rest of his squadron, which had separated from him in the passage: but one of these, the Lowe-stoffe, commanded by captain Deane, had entered the harbour of Quebec on the ninth day of May, and communicated to the governor the joyful news that the squadron was arrived in the river. Commodore Swanton no sooner received intimation that Quebec was besieged, than he sailed up the river with all possible expedition, and on the fifteenth in the evening anchored above Point Levi. General Murray expressing an earnest desire, that the French squadron above the town might be removed, the commodore ordered captain Schomberg of the Diana and captain Deane of the Lowe-stoffe, to slip their cables early next morning, and attack the enemy's fleet, consisting of two frigates, two armed ships, and a good number of smaller vessels. They were no sooner in motion than the French ships fled in the utmost disorder. One of their frigates was driven on the rocks above Cape Diamond; the other ran ashore, and was burned at Point au Tremble about ten leagues above the town; and all the other vessels were taken or destroyed.

The enemy were so thunderstruck by this unexpected disaster, and the certain intelligence that a strong English fleet was already arrived in the river of St. Laurence, that in the following night they raised the siege of Quebec, and retreated with great precipitation, leaving their provisions, implements, and artillery, to governor Murray, who had intended to make a vigorous sally in the morning, and attempt to penetrate into the camp of the besiegers, which, from the information of prisoners and deserters, he conceived to be a very practicable scheme. For this purpose he had selected a body of troops, who were already under arms, when a lieutenant whom he had sent out with a detachment to amuse the enemy, came and assured him that their trenches were abandoned. He instantly marched out of Quebec at the head of his forces, in hope of overtaking, and making an impression on their rear, that he might have ample revenge for his late discomfiture; but they had passed the river Caprouge before he could come up with their army; however, he took some prisoners, and a great quantity of baggage, including their tents, stores, magazines of provision and ammunition, with thirty four pieces of battering cannon, ten field-pieces, six mortars, four petards, a great number of scaling ladders, intrenching tools, and every other implement of a siege. They retired to Jaques quartier, where their ammunition beginning to fail, and finding themselves deserted by great part of the Canadians, they resigned all hope of succeeding against Quebec, and began to take measures for the preservation of Montreal, against which the force under general Amherst was directed.

There Mr. de Vaudreuil had fixed his headquarters, and there he proposed to make his last stand against the efforts of the British general. He not only levied forces, collected magazines, and erected new fortifications in the island of Montreal, but he had even recourse to feigned intelligence, and other arts of delusion, to support the spirit of the Canadians and their Indian allies, which had begun to flag, in consequence of their being obliged to abandon the siege of Quebec. It must be owned he acted with all the spirit and vigilance of an experienced general, determined to exert himself for the preservation of the colony, even tho' he could entertain but very little hopes of success. These, however slender they were, depended upon the natural strength of the country, rendered almost inaccessible by woods, mountains, and morasses, which might have retarded the progress of the English, and protracted the war, until a general pacification could be effected.

In the mean time major general Amherst was diligently employed in taking measures for the execution of the plan he had concerted, in order to complete the conquest of Canada. He transmitted instructions to general Murray, directing him to advance by water towards Montreal, with all the troops that could be spared from the garrison of Quebec. He detached colonel Haviland with a body of troops from Crown-point to take possession of the isle au Noix, in Lake-Champlain, and from thence penetrate the shortest way to the bank of the river St. Laurence; while he himself, with the main body of the army, amounting to above ten thousand men, including Indians, should proceed from the frontiers of New York, by the rivers of the Mohawks and Oneidas, to the lake Ontario, and sail down the river St. Laurence to the island of Montreal. Thus, on the supposition that all these particulars could be executed, the enemy must have been at last hemmed in, and entirely surrounded. In pursuance of this plan, general Amherst had provided two armed sloops to cruise on the lake Ontario, under the command of captain Loring; as well as a great number of batteaus, or smaller vessels for the transportation of the troops, artillery, and ammunition, implements, and baggage. Several regiments were ordered to advance from Albany to Oswego; and the general, taking his departure from Schenectady, with the rest of the forces, in the latter end of June, arrived at the same place on the ninth day of July.

Having received advice, that two French vessels had appeared off Oswego, he dispatched some batteaus to Niagara with intelligence to captain Loring, who immediately set sail in quest of them; but they escaped his pursuit, though they had twice appeared in the neighbourhood of Oswego since the arrival of the general, who endeavoured to amuse them by detaching batteaus to different parts of the lake. The army being assembled, and reinforced by a considerable body of Indians under the command of Sir William Johnson, the general detached colonel Haldemand with the light infantry, the grenadiers, and one battalion of Highlanders, to take post at the bottom of the lake, and to assist the armed vessels in finding a passage to La Galette. On the tenth day of August the army embarked on board the batteaus and whale boats, and proceeded on the lake towards the mouth of the river St. Laurence. Hearing that one of the enemy's vessels had run aground and was disabled, and that the other lay off La Galette, he determined to make the best of his way down the river to Swegatchie, and attack the French fort at Isle Royale, one of the most important posts on the river St. Laurence, the source of which it in a great measure commands. On the seventeenth the row-gallies fell in with the French sloop commanded by Mr. de la Broquerie, who surrendered after a warm engagement. Mr. Amherst having detached some engineers to reconnoitre the coasts and islands in the neighbourhood of Isle Royale, he made a disposition for the attack of that fortress, which was accordingly invested, after he had taken possession of the islands. Some of these the enemy had abandoned with such precipitation, as to leave behind a few scalps they had taken on the Mohawk river, a number of tools and utensils, two swivels, some barrels of pitch, and a large quantity quantity of iron. The Indians were so incensed at sight of the scalps, that they burned a chapel, and all the houses of the enemy. Batteries being raised on the nearest islands, the fort was cannonaded not only by them, but likewise by the armed sloops; and a disposition was made for giving the assault, when Mr. Pouchaut thought proper to beat a parley, and surrender on capitulation. The general, having taken possession of the fort, found it so well situated for commanding the lake Ontario, and the Mohawk river, that he resolved to maintain it with a garrison, and employed some days in repairing the fortifications.

From this place his navigation down the river St. Laurence was rendered extremely difficult and dangerous, by a great number of violent riffes, or rapides, and falls; among which he lost above fourscore men, forty-six batteaus, seventeen whale-boats, one row-galley, with some artillery, stores, and ammunition. On the sixth day of September the troops were debarked on the island of Montreal without any opposition, except from some flying parties, which exchanged a few shot, and then fled with precipitation. That same day he repaired a bridge which they had broke down in their retreat, and, after a march of two leagues, drew up his army on a plain before Montreal, where they lay all night on their arms. Montreal is, in point of importance, the second place in Canada, situated in an island of the river St. Laurence, at an equal distance from Quebec and the lake Ontario. Its central situation rendered it the staple of the Indian trade; yet the fortifications of it were inconsiderable, not at all adequate to the value of the place.

General Amherst ordered some pieces of artillery to be brought up immediately from the landing-place at La Chine, where he had left some regiments for the security of the boats, and determined to undertake the siege in form; but in the morning of the seventh he received a letter from the marquis de Vaudreuil by two officers, demanding a capitulation: which, after some letters had passed between the two generals, was granted upon as favourable terms as the French had reason to expect, considering that general Murray, with the troops from Quebec, had, by this time, landed on the island; and colonel Haviland, with the body under his command, had just arrived on the south side of the river opposite to Montreal: circumstances equally favourable and surprising, if we reflect upon the different routes they pursued, thro' an enemy's country, where they had no intelligence of each other's motions. Had any accident retarded the progress of general Amherst, the reduction of Montreal would have been attempted by general Murray, who embarked with his troops at Quebec on board of a great number of small vessels, under the command of captain Deane in the Diana. This gentleman, with uncommon ability, surmounted the difficulties of an unknown, dangerous, and intricate navigation; and conducted the voyage with such success, that not a single vessel was lost in the expedition. Mr. de Levis, at the head of his forces, observed the motions of general Murray, who, in sailing up the river, distributed manifestoes among the Canadians, which produced all the effect he could desire. Almost all the parishes on the south-shore, as far as the river Sorel, submitted and took an oath of neutrality; and lord Rollo disarmed the inhabitants of the north shore as far as Trois Rivières, which, though the capital of a district, being no other than an open village, was taken without resistance. In a word, general Amherst took possession of Montreal; and thus finished the conquest of all Canada: a conquest the most important that ever the British arms achieved, whether we consider the safety of the English colonies in North America, now secured from invasion and incroachment; the extent and fertility of the country subdued; or the whole Indian commerce thus transferred to the traders of Great Britain.

The French ministry had endeavoured to succour Montreal, by equipping a considerable number of storeships, and sending them out in the spring under convoy of a frigate; but as their officers understood that the British squadron had sailed up the river St. Laurence before them, they took shelter in the bay of Chaleurs on the coast of Acadia, where they did not long remain unmolested. Captain Byron, who commanded the ships of war that were left at Louisbourg, having received information of their arrival from brigadier-general Whitmore, sailed thither with a squadron, and found them at anchor. The whole fleet consisted of one frigate, two large store-ships, and nineteen sail of smaller vessels, the greater part of which had been taken from the merchants of Great Britain: all these were destroyed, together with two batteries which had been raised for their protection. The French town, consisting of two hundred houses, was demolished, and the settlement totally ruined.

All the French subjects inhabiting the territories from the bay of Fundy to the banks of the river St. Laurence, and all the Indians through that tract of country, were now subdued, and subjected to the English government. In the month of December, of the preceding year, the French colonists of Miramichi, Rickebuctou, and other places lying along the gulf of St. Laurence, made their submission by deputies to colonel Frye, who commanded in Fort Cumberland at Chignecto. They afterwards renewed this submission, in the most solemn manner, by subscribing articles; by which they obliged themselves, and the people they represented, to repair in the spring to Bay Verte, with all their effects and shipping, to be disposed of according to the direction of colonel Laurence, governor of Halifax in Nova Scotia. They were attended by two Indian chiefs of the nation of the Mickmacks, a powerful and numerous people, now become entirely dependent upon his Britannic majesty. In a word, by the conquest of Canada, the Indian fur-trade, in its full extent, was transferred into the hands of the English. The French interest among the savage tribes inhabiting an immense tract of country, was totally annihilated; and their American possessions shrunk within the limits of Louisiana, an infant colony on the south of the Mississippi, which the British arms could at any time easily subdue.

The conquest of Canada being finished, nothing now remained to be done in North America, except the demolition of the fortifications of Louisbourg on the island of Cape Breton; for which purpose, some able engineers had been dispatched from England with the ships commanded by captain Byron. By means of mines artfully disposed and well constructed, the fortifications were reduced to a heap of rubbish; the glacis was levelled, and the ditches were filled. All the artillery, ammunition, and implements of war, were transported to Halifax: but the barracks were repaired so as to accommodate three hundred men occasionally; and the hospital, with the private houses, were left standing.

The French still retained possession of the fertile country lying on each side of the great river Mississippi, which empties itself into the Gulph of Florida; but the colony was so thinly peopled and so ill provided, that, far from being able to endanger the English settlements, it scarce could have subsisted, unless the British traders had been base and treacherous enough to supply it from time to time with provisions and necessaries. The same infamous commerce was carried on with several French plantations in the West-Indies; insomuch that the governors of provinces, and commanders of squadrons stationed in those seas, made formal complaints of it to the ministry. In consequence of these representations, Mr. Pitt sent a letter to the several governors and councils in North America, importing, that the commanders of his majesty's forces and fleets in North America and the West-Indies, had transmitted certain and repeated intelligences, of an illegal and most pernicious trade carried on by the king's subjects in North-America, and the West Indies; as well to the French islands, as to the French settlements on the continent of America; and particularly to the rivers Mobile and Mississippi; by which the enemies, to the great reproach and detriment of government, were supplied with provisions and other necessaries; whereby they were principally, if not alone, enabled to sustain and protract this long and expensive war: and that it further appearing that large sums of bullion were sent by the king's subjects to the above places, in return whereof commodities were taken, which interfered with the product of the British colonies themselves, in open contempt of the authority of the mother-country, as well as the most manifest prejudice of the manufactures and trade of Great-Britain: in order to put the most speedy and effectual stop to such flagitious practices, so utterly subversive of all laws, and so highly repugnant to the well-being of this kingdom; it was his majesty's express will and pleasure, that they should forthwith make the strictest and most diligent enquiry into the state of this dangerous and ignominious trade: and that they should use every means in their power to detect and discover persons concerned either as principals or accessaries therein: that they should take every step, authorised by law, to bring such heinous offenders to the most exemplary and condign punishment: that as soon as may be, and from time to time, they should transmit to him, for the king's information, full and particular accounts of the progress they should have made in the execution of this his majesty's command; to the which the king expected they should pay the most exact obedience: and that they were further to use their utmost endeavours to trace out and investigate the various artifices and evasions, by which the dealers in this iniquitous intercourse found means to cover their criminal proceedings, and elude the law; in order that from such lights due and timely considerations might be had, what farther provision might be necessary to restrain an evil of such extensive and pernicious consequences.

Notwithstanding this peremptory intimation, the temptation of extraordinary profit excited the merchants not only to assist the enemies of their country, but also to run all risques in eluding the vigilance of the legislature. The inhabitants of Martinique found a plentiful market of provision furnished by the British subjects at the Dutch islands of St. Eustatia and Curacoa; and those that were settled on the island of Hispaniola were supplied in the same manner at the Spanish settlement of Monte Christo.

While the British arms triumphed and prospered in almost every quarter of the universe, the colonists of Jamaica ran the most imminent hazard of being extirpated by a domestic enemy. The negro slaves of that island, grown insolent in the contemplation of their own formidable numbers, or by observing the supine indolence of their masters, or stimulated by that appetite for liberty, so natural to the mind of man, began, in the course of this year, to entertain thoughts of shaking off the yoke by means of a general insurrection. Assemblies were held, and plans projected for this purpose. At length they concerted a scheme for rising in arms all at once in different parts of the island, in order to massacre all the white men, and take possession of the government. They resolved, that this design should be put in execution immediately after the departure of the fleet for Europe: but their plan was defeated by their own ignorance and impatience. Those of the conspirators, that belonged to captain Forrest's estate, being impelled by the fumes of intoxication, fell suddenly upon the overseer while he sat at supper with some friends, and butchered the whole company. Being immediately joined by some of their confederates, they attacked the neighbouring plantations, where they repeated the same barbarities, and seizing all the arms and ammunition that fell in their way, began to grow formidable to the colony.

The governor was no sooner informed of this disturbance, than he issued a proclamation, subjecting the colonists to martial law. All other business was interrupted, and every man took to his arms. The regular troops, joined by the militia and a considerable number of volunteers, marched from Spanish Town to St. Mary's, where the insurrection began, and skirmished with the insurgents; but as they declined standing any regular engagement, and trusted chiefly to bush-fighting, the governor employed against them the free blacks, commonly known by the name of the Wild Negroes, now peaceably settled under the protection of the government. These auxiliaries, in consideration of a price set upon the heads of the rebels, attacked them in their own way, slew them by surprize, until their strength was broken, and numbers made away with themselves, in despair; so that the insurrection was supposed to be quelled about the beginning of May: but in June it broke out again with redoubled fury, and the rebels were reinforced to a very considerable number. The regular troops and the militia, tia, joined by a body of sailors, formed a camp under the command of colonel Spragge, who sent out detachments against the negroes, a good number of whom were killed and some taken; but the rest, instead of submitting, took shelter in the woods and mountains. The prisoners being tried, and found guilty of rebellion, were put to death by a variety of tortures. Some were hanged; some beheaded; some burned; and some fixed alive upon gibets. One of these last lived eight days and eighteen hours, suspended under a vertical sun, without being refreshed by one drop of water, or receiving any manner of sustenance.

In order to prevent such insurrections for the future, the justices assembled at the sessions of the peace, ordained by a public decree, that no negro-slave should be allowed to quit his plantation without a white conductor, or a ticket of leave: that every negro playing at any sort of game should be scourged through the public streets: that every publican suffering such gaming in his house should forfeit forty shillings: that every proprietor suffering his negroes to beat a drum, blow a horn, or make any other noise in his plantation, should be fined in ten pounds; and every overseer allowing these irregularities, should pay half that sum, to be demanded, or distrained for, by any civil or military officer: that every free negro, or mulatto, should wear a blue cross on his right shoulder, on pain of imprisonment; that no mulatto, Indian, or negro, should hawk or sell any thing, except fresh fish and milk, on pain of being scourged: that rum and punch houses should be shut during divine service on Sundays, under the penalty of twenty shillings; and that those who had petit licences should shut up their houses on other nights at nine o' clock. Notwithstanding these examples and regulations, a body of rebellious negroes still subsisted in places that were deemed inaccessible to regular forces, and from these they made nocturnal irruptions into the nearest plantations, where they acted with all the wantonness of barbarity; so that the people of Jamaica were obliged to conduct themselves with the utmost vigilance and circumspection, while rear-admiral Holmes, who commanded at sea, took every precaution to secure the island from insult or invasion.

Nor did he confine his sole attention to the security of Jamaica: he likewise contrived and executed schemes for annoying the enemy at open sea. Having, in the month of October, received intimation that five French frigates were lying at Cape Francois on the island of Hispaniola, in order to convoy a fleet of merchant ships to Europe, he stationed the ships under his command, in such a manner as was most likely to intercept this fleet; and his disposition was attended with success. The enemy sailed from the Cape, to the number of eight sail, on the sixteenth, and next day they were chased by the king's ships the Hampshire, Lively, and Boreas, which however could not overtake them, as there was little wind, and that variable. In the evening the breeze freshened, and about midnight the Boreas came up with the Sirenne, commanded by commodore Mac Cartie. They engaged with great vivacity for about twenty-five minutes, when the Sirenne shot a-head, and made the best of her way. The Boreas was so damaged in her rigging, that she could not close with the enemy again till next day at two in the afternoon, when the action was renewed off the east end of Cuba, and maintained till forty minutes past four, when Mr. Mac Cartie struck.

In the mean time, the Hampshire and Lively gave chase to the other four French frigates, which steered southward with all the sail they could carry, in order to reach the west end of Tortuga, and take refuge in Port au Prince. On the eighteenth the Lively, by the help of her oars, came up with the Valeur at half an hour past seven in the morning; and after a hot action that continued an hour and an half, compelled the enemy to submit. The Hampshire stood after the other three, and, about four in the afternoon, ran up between the duke de Choiseul and the Prince Edward. These he engaged at the same time; but the first, having the advantage of the wind, made her retreat into Port au Paix: the other ran ashore about two leagues to leeward, and struck her colours; but, at the approach of the Hampshire, the enemy set her on fire, and she blew up. This was also the fate of the Fleur de Lis, which had run into Fresh-water bay, a little farther to leeward of Port au Prince. Thus, by the prudent disposition of admiral Holmes, and the gallantry of his three captains, Norbury, Uvedale, and Maitland, two large frigates of the enemy were taken, and three destroyed.

The spirit of the captains was happily seconded by an extraordinary exertion of courage in the inferior officers and common men. Immediately after the capture of the French frigates, eight of the enemy's privateers were destroyed or brought into Jamaica. Two of these, namely the Vainqueur of ten guns, sixteen swivels, and ninety men, and the Mackau of six swivels, and fifteen men, had run into shoal-water in Cumberland harbour, on the island of Cuba. The boats of the Trent and Boreas were manned under the direction of the lieutenants Millar and Stuart, who being rowed up to the Vainqueur, boarded and took possession under a close fire, after having surmounted many other difficulties. The Mackau was taken, without any resistance; then the boats proceeded against the Guespe of eight guns and eighty-five men, which lay at anchor farther up in the Lagoon; but before they came up, the enemy had set her on fire, and she was destroyed.

The same activity and resolution distinguished the captains and officers of the Squadron commanded by Sir James Douglas off the Leeward islands. In the month of September, the captains Obrien and Taylor, of the ships Temple and Griffin, being on a joint cruise off the islands Grenadas, received intelligence that the Virgin, formerly a British sloop of war, which had been taken by the enemy, then lay at anchor, together with three privateers, under protection of three forts on the island. They accordingly sailed thither in order to attack them; and their enterprize was happily crowned with success. After a warm engagement, that lasted several hours, the enemies batteries were silenced, and indeed demolished, and the English captains took possession of the four prizes. They afterwards entered another harbour of that island, having first demolished another fort; and there there lay four days unmolested, at the expiration of which they carried off three other prizes. In their return to Antigua, they fell in with thirteen ships, bound to Martinique with provisions, and took them all without resistance. About the same time, eight or nine privateers were taken by the ships which commodore Sir James Douglas employed in cruising round the island of Guadaloupe; so that the British commerce in those seas flourished under his care and protection.

Having thus given a particular account of all the military transactions that distinguished this year in Europe, America, and the West Indies, we must now turn our eyes to the progress of the British arms in the East Indies, where they were no less successful than in the West Indies. After the reduction of Arcot, the garrisons of Permacoil and Allumparva surrendered themselves prisoners of war in the beginning of May. The Falmouth compelled the Haarlem, a French ship from Merguy, to run ashore to the northward of Pondicherry. The important settlement of Carical was reduced by the sea and land forces commanded by rear-admiral Cornish and major Monson, and the French garrison made prisoners of war.

Colonel Coote, after having defeated the French general Lally in the field, and subdued several of the enemy's settlements on the coast of Coromandel, at length shut them up within the walls of Pondicherry, the principal seat of the French East India company, large, populous, well fortified, and defended by a numerous garrison, under the immediate command of their general. In the month of October admiral Stevens departed from Trincamaley with all his squadron, in order to its being repaired, except five sail of the line, which he left under the command of captain Haldane to block up Pondicherry by sea, while Mr. Coote should carry on the siege by land. By this disposition, and the activity of the British officers, the place was so streightened for want of provisions as to be almost reduced to a starving condition, even before the siege could be undertaken in form; for the rainy season rendered all regular approaches impracticable. These rains being abated by the twenty-sixth day of November, colonel Coote directed the engineers to pitch upon proper places for erecting batteries, that should enfilade or flank the works of the fortress, without exposing their own men to any severe fire from the enemy. Accordingly four batteries were constructed in different places, so as to answer these purposes, and opened all at once on the eighth day of December at mid-night. Though placed at a considerable distance, they were plied with good effect, and the besieged returned the fire with great vivacity. This mutual cannonading continued until the twenty-ninth day of the month, when the engineers were employed in raising another battery near enough to effect a breach in the north-west counter-guard and curtain. Though the approaches were retarded some days by a violent storm, which almost ruined the works, the damage was soon repaired; a considerable post was taken from the enemy by assault, and afterwards regained by the French grenadiers, through the timidity of the Sipoys, by whom it was defended. By the fifteenth of January, a second battery being raised within point-blank, a breach was made in the curtain; the west face and flank of the north-west bastion were ruined, and the guns of the enemy intirely silenced.

The garrison and inhabitants of Pondicherry being now in danger of perishing with hunger, the principal of the Jesuits, accompanied by two civilians, came out, and offered terms of capitulation. The governor, preserving all his haughtiness, which neither his errors nor his misfortunes could abate, declined to offer any terms: he sent out a paper full of invectives against the English, for the breach of treaties relative to India. He alleged, that these breaches rendered him incapable of proposing any conditions; and, in consequence, he rather suffered the English troops to take possession of the place, than formally surrendered it. As the governor refused to capitulate, the proposals of the inhabitants were little regarded; and the city of Pondicherry, with a garrison of about fourteen hundred European soldiers, a vast quantity of military stores, and great riches, was given up at discretion to the victorious arms of the English.

Nothing can be said too highly of the conduct, courage, and perseverance of the officers and soldiers during a tedious siege and a blockade of eight months, in a climate so unfavourable to all military operations. Colonel Coote gave the final blow to the French power in India: he was now undisputed master of the rich coast of Coromandel; the French power was wholly annihilated; the neutral nations were contemptible; the princes of the country regarded us with awe and veneration; and nothing but a little French settlement on the coast of Malabar, called Mahie (and which was soon after reduced) hindered our commanding the whole trade of the vast peninsula of India, from the Ganges to the Indies, the most extensive and profitable sphere of commerce in the world.

It must be observed, likewise, for the honour of the service, that, during the whole expedition, the most perfect harmony prevailed between the land and sea officers, who vied with each other in contributing their efforts towards the success of the enterprize. On the twenty-fifth day of December rear-admiral Stevens arrived with four ships of the line, having parted with rear-admiral Cornish and his division in stormy weather: but he joined them at Pondicherry before the place was taken. On the first day of January a violent tempest obliged admiral Stevens to slip his cables and put to sea, where he was separated from the rest of his squadron; and when in three days he returned to the road of Pondicherry, he had the mortification to find that his division had suffered severely from the storm. The ships of war, called the Duke Aquitaine and the Sunderland, foundered in the storm, and their crews perished. The Newcastle, the Queenborough, and Protector fireship, were driven on shore and destroyed; but the men were saved, together with the cannon, stores, and provisions. Many other ships sustained considerable damage, which, however, was soon repaired. Mr. Stevens, having intercepted a letter from general Lally to Mr. Ramond, the French president at Pullicat, in which he informed him of the intire destruction of the English fleet, and solicited immediate assistance; assistance; the British admiral dispatched letters to the Dutch and Danish settlements on that coast, intimating, that, notwithstanding the insinuations of general Lally, he had eleven sail of the line, with two frigates, under his command, all fit for service, in the road of Pondicherry, which was closely invested and blockaded both by sea and land. He therefore declared, that as in that case it was contrary to the law of nations for any neutral power to relieve or succour the besieged, he was determined to seize any vessel that should attempt to throw provisions into the place.

While the arms of Great Britain were thus successful in almost every quarter of the globe, an event happened, which, for a moment, obscured the splendor of her triumphs, and damped the joy which these occasioned. On the twenty-fifth day of October, early in the morning, king George the second was, without any previous disorder, suddenly seized with the agony of death, at the palace at Kensington. He had risen at his usual hour, called his page, drank his chocolate, and inquired about the wind, as anxious for the arrival of the foreign mails; then he opened a window of his apartment, and observing the weather was serene, signified his intention to walk in the garden. In a few minutes after this intimation, while he remained alone in his chamber, he fell down upon the floor: the noise of his fall brought his attendants into the room, who lifted him on the bed, where he desired in a faint voice, that the princess Amelia might be called; but, before she could reach the apartment, he had expired. An attempt was made to bleed him, but without effect; and indeed his malady was far beyond the reach of art; for, when the cavity of the thorax or chest was opened, and inspected by the serjeant surgeons, they found the right ventricle of the heart actually ruptured, and a great quantity of blood discharged through the aperture into the surrounding pericardium; so that he must have died instantaneously in consequence of the effusion.

Such was the unexpected, though not premature death of George the second, king of Great Britain, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, and the thirty-fourth of his reign. He was in his person rather lower than the middle size, well-shaped, erect, with eyes remarkably prominent, a high nose, and fair complexion. In his temper he is said to have been sudden and violent; but this, though it influenced his private behaviour, made no impression on his public conduct, which was always sufficiently deliberate and attentive to his own interest, and that of his subjects.

Sincere and honest in his intentions, he was never known to be guilty of deceit: true to his word, he was never seen to violate his promise: steady in his favour and protection to his servants, he never changed them willingly; and those who attended more immediately on his person, were scarce ever removed, but grew old along with him, or died in their places. But having been in a manner compelled, by a violent faction, to relinquish a minister, for whom he had a great affection, and in whom he reposed an unlimited confidence, it afterwards became a matter of more indifference to him by whom he was served in the affairs of his government.

His parts were not lively or brilliant; but the whole of his conduct demonstrates, that he had a judgment both solid and comprehensive. He understood the interests of the several sovereigns of Europe; and was particularly skilled in all the intricacies of that political labyrinth, the system of Germany; of the liberties of which he was, through his whole life, a most zealous assertor. In the last war but one he took up arms, and even risked his own person, when, by the projected dismemberment of the house of Austria, they were in danger of falling a sacrifice to a French faction. In the war which succeeded, when the liberties of the empire were threatened by the Austrian family, he resisted with equal firmness, that very house which he had formerly exposed his life to defend.

He lived entirely to extinguish party and the spirit of party in his own dominions: it was not till the close of his reign, that his family might have been considered as firmly and immoveably seated on the throne; but he, having baffled all the private machinations of his enemies policy, subdued at length the utmost efforts of their force: and though, on that menacing occasion, he experienced, in the fullest measure, the affection of his people, yet the completion of this great service to his family he owed chiefly to the capacity and bravery of his own son.

Placed in the highest and most exalted station, he lived with his queen in that kind of harmony and confidence that is seen between the best suited couple in private life. He had a numerous issue, in which he had great cause of satisfaction, and very little of disquiet, except what was the almost necessary consequence of a life protracted to a late period. He survived several of his children. He had the satisfaction to see in his successor, what is very rare, the most dutiful obedience, the most perfect acquiescence in his will; and, what is no less rare, contrary to the fortune of most old kings, he never possessed more fully the love of his subjects than in the last year of his life. And he died at that very period, when the terror of his arms, the power of his kingdoms, and the wisdom of his government, were all raised to almost as high a pitch as they could possibly reach: they were indeed carried to such a height of glory and prosperity, as had never been exceeded, and hardly ever equalled in the reign of the most fortunate of his predecessors. Arriving in England at a riper age, and, of consequence, having never been able to attain a perfect knowledge of the force and beauties of the English language; he never shewed a sufficient regard to the British literature, which in his reign did not flourish; and this may be considered as the greatest, or rather the only blemish that lay upon his government. Though frequently censured, and perhaps not unjustly, as a little too attentive to money in some minute particulars, yet this disposition never discovered itself in one rapacious act, nor ever influenced his conduct on any important occasion; for it is now well known, that he shewed no improper parsimony, when the late war broke out. In fact, he expended so much in that interesting emergence, that, on his decease, his private wealth was found to be greatly inferior to what had been commonly imagined.

It has been often alleged, that during his whole life, he shewed a remarkable affection to his Hanoverian subjects: but the last act of it demonstrated that they were far from engrossing the whole of his regard; and that in reality his German possessions held no other place in his estimation than what their relative importance to the rest of his dominions naturally demanded: for when that truly severe trial came, in which the interests of England and Hanover were separated; when a war was begun for an object wholly foreign to this last country; a war, in which Hanover must suffer much, and could hope for nothing; even then his majesty did not hesitate a moment to expose his German dominions to almost inevitable ruin, rather than make, or even propose, the smallest abatement from the immensity of the English rights in America: a conduct that more than wipes off every suspicion of an improper partiality, and which surely ought never to be mentioned without the highest gratitude to the memory of that magnanimous prince.

Were we to ransack the whole stores of ancient and modern history, it would perhaps be impossible to exhibit a more pleasing or instructive picture, than what might be formed by taking a just view of his late majesty's conduct to these two so differently constituted parts of his dominions. His virtue was proved by two of the greatest trials to which the nature of man is subject; the trust of absolute and unlimited power, and the most exalted station, circumscribed by the strictest laws. For these two so very different situations, very different and almost opposite tempers and talents have been always thought necessary. But George II. had a mind perfectly adapted to both: for whilst in England, he kept the liberties of his people inviolate, and, like a wise magistrate, was pleased to make his authority co-operate with law, and his will freely subservient to the wisdom of ages; in Hanover, like an indulgent father, acting only from the sentiments of a paternal heart, his affection and his equity supplied the want of law and constitution. He left, indeed, to his illustrious successor, an admirable example, which he has hitherto not only followed, but in many respects exceeded: and his subjects take the greater interest in his virtues, as they look upon them as more peculiarly their own; and they now boast a prince who neither has, nor can have, any partiality but the best, and who is in birth as well as in inclination a Briton †.

I shall close my account of this reign with particularising the principal domestic occurrences that engrossed the attention of the public during the course of this year.

In the month of December, 1759, William Horne, a gentleman of some fortune in Derbyshire, was executed at Nottingham, in the seventy-fourth year of his age, for the murder of an infant born of his own sister, in the year 1724. On the third day after the birth, this brutal ruffian thrust the child into a linen bag, and, accompanied by his own brother on horseback, conveyed it to Annesley in Nottinghamshire, where it was next day found dead under a hay-stack. Though this unnatural monster knew how much he lay at the mercy of his brother, whom he had made privy to this affair, far from endeavouring to engage his secrecy by offices of kindness and marks of affection, he treated him as an alien to his blood; not barely with indifference, but even with the most barbarous rigour. He not only defrauded him of his right, but exacted of him the lowest menial services; beheld him starving in a cottage, while he lived himself in affluence; and refused to relieve, with a morsel of bread, the children of his own brother begging at his gate.

It was the relentment of this pride and barbarity which, in all likelihood, first impelled the other to revenge. He pretended qualms of conscience, and disclosed the transaction of the child to several individuals. As the brother was universally hated for the insolence and brutality of his disposition, information was given against him, and a resolution formed to bring him to condign punishment. Being apprised of this design, he tampered with his brother, and desired that he would retract, upon the trial, the evidence he had given before the justice. Though the brother rejected this scheme of perjury, he offered to withdraw himself from the kingdom, if he might have five pounds to defray the expence of his voyage. So sordidly avaricious was the other, that he refused to advance this miserable pittance, though he knew his own life depended upon his compliance. He was accordingly apprehended, tried, and convicted on his brother's evidence; and then he confessed the particulars of exposing the infant. He denied, indeed that he had any thought the child would perish, and declared he intended it as a present to the late Mr. Chaworth of Annesley, at whose gate it was laid: but as he appeared to be a hardened wretch, devoid of humanity, stained with the complicated crimes of tyranny, fraud, rapine, incest, and murder, very little credit is due to his declaration.

But no subject so much engaged the attention of the public, as did the case of lord George Sackville, who had by this time resigned his command in Germany, and returned to England, where his character was represented in the most odious and detestable colours. With the first news of the battle of Minden, arrived the defamation of this officer. He was accused of having disobeyed orders, and of having been guilty of the most shameful cowardice. These were the suggestions of a vague report, which no person could trace to its origin; yet this report immediately gave birth to one of the most inflammatory pamphlets that ever was exhibited to the public. The first charge had alarmed the people of England, jealous in honour, sudden and rash in their resentments, and obstinately adhering to the prejudices they have espoused. The implied accusation in the orders of prince Ferdinand, and the combustible matter superadded by the pamphlet-writer, kindled up such a blaze of indignation in the minds of the people, as admitted of no temperament or con-

† George II. had, by his queen Caroline, two sons and five daughters, who attained the age of maturity; Frederic prince of Wales, father to his present majesty George III. William, late duke of Cumberland; Anne, the princess-royal, married to the late prince of Orange, and mother to the present stadtholder; Mary, landgravine of Hesse-Cassel; Louisa, late queen of Denmark; Amelia, and Caroline, who never married.

troul. An abhorrence and detestation of lord George Sackville, as a coward and a traitor, became the universal passion, which acted by contagion, infecting all degrees of people from the highest to the lowest; and no individual, who had the least regard for his own character and quiet, would venture to preach up moderation, or even advise a suspension of belief, until more certain information could be procured. Fresh fuel was continually thrown in by obscure authors of pamphlets and news-papers, who stigmatized and insulted with such a spirit of virulence, that one would have imagined they were actuated by personal motives, not retained by mercenary book-sellers, against that unfortunate nobleman. Not satisfied with inventing circumstances to his dishonour, in his conduct on the last occasion, they pretended to take a retrospective view of his character, and produced a number of anecdotes to his prejudice, which had never before seen the light, and but for this occasion had probably never been known. Not that all the writings, which appeared on this subject, contained fresh matter of aggravation against lord George Sackville. Some writers, either encouraged by the hope of reward, or hired to betray the cause which they undertook to defend, entered the lists as professed champions of the accused, assumed the pen in his behalf, devoid of sense, unfurnished with materials, and produced performances, which could not fail to injure his character among all those, who believed, that he countenanced their endeavours, and supplied them with the facts and arguments of his defence.

Such precisely was the state of the dispute, when lord George Sackville arrived in London. He was now made acquainted with the particulars of this imputed guilt, which he had before indistinctly learned. He was accused of having disobeyed three successive orders he had received from the general, during the action at Minden, to advance with the cavalry of the right wing, which he commanded, and sustain the infantry that were engaged; and after the cavalry were put in motion, of having halted them unnecessarily, and marched so slow, that they could not reach the place of action in time to be of any service; by which conduct the opportunity was lost of attacking the enemy when they gave way, and rendering the victory more glorious and decisive.

The first step which lord George took towards the vindication of his own character, was in presenting to the public the following address: "The various reports, said he, that have been propagated to my disadvantage, and the many falsehoods which have been asserted to ruin my character, lay me under the necessity of remaining not entirely silent, though I am debarred at present from stating my case to the public, as I should have done, had I not assurances of obtaining a court-martial for my trial; the only legal and effectual method of convincing the world how little foundation there has been for the torrent of calumny and abuse, which has been so maliciously thrown out against me.

"I had rather, upon this occasion, submit myself to all the inconveniencies that may arise from the want of stile, than borrow assistance from the pens of others, as I can have no hopes of establishing my character, but from the force of truth. I shall, therefore, as plainly and distinctly as possible, relate a few circumstances, which will at least shew that no body could be more desirous than I am to bring truth to light, and subject my conduct to the strictest scrutiny.

"The instant I found by the implied censure given out in orders the second of August, that my conduct had appeared in an unfavourable light to prince Ferdinand, on the day of action, I endeavoured to inform myself what particular I had either failed in or neglected my duty; I heard in general of disobedience of orders, but I could fix no certain period of time to my supposed crime, till colonel Fitzroy acquainted me with what had passed between his serene highness and him upon my subject, in regard to the orders delivered to me by him (colonel Fitzroy) that day. Whenever my trial comes, I shall endeavour to clear up that point to the satisfaction of the public: my own assertions may have little weight, but the oaths of witnesses, whose veracity cannot be called in question, will, I trust, prove my innocence beyond the possibility of doubt.

"Under these circumstances, I immediately applied for his majesty's permission to return to England, that I might answer any accusation that should be brought against me; for, as commander in chief of the British forces in Germany, no person there could order a court-martial for my trial, had there been an accusation laid; the power of summoning courts-martial and approving their sentences, was vested in me by my commission, and no British officer or soldier could be tried by any other authority.

"As soon as I arrived in London, on Friday-evening the seventh, I instantly wrote the following letter to the secretary of state.

"My Lord,

"I have the honour of acquainting your lordship with my arrival in England, in pursuance of his majesty's permission, sent to me, at my request, by your lordship.

"I thought myself much injured abroad, by an implied censure upon my conduct; I find I am still more unfortunate at home, by being publicly represented as having neglected my duty in the strongest manner, by disobeying the positive orders of his serene highness prince Ferdinand: as I am conscious of neither neglect, nor disobedience of orders; as I am certain I did my duty to the utmost of my abilities; and as I am persuaded that the prince himself would have found, that he had no just cause of complaint against me, had he condescended to have inquired into my conduct, before he had expressed his disapprobation of it, from the partial representation of others: I therefore most humbly request, that I may at last have a public opportunity given me of attempting to justify myself to his majesty, and to my country, by a court-martial being appointed; that if I am guilty, I may suffer such punishment as I may have deserved; and, if innocent, that I may stand acquitted in the opinion of the world: but it is really too severe to have been censured unheard; to have have been condemned before I was tried; and to be informed neither of my crime, nor of my accusers.

I am, my Lord, &c. &c.

GEORGE SACKVILLE."

"I received an answer to this letter on Monday the tenth, in which I was assured that a court-martial, upon my application, would be granted, as soon as the officers, capable of giving evidence, could leave their posts; but previously to the receipt of that letter, I was dismissed from all my military employments; notwithstanding which dismissal, I still hope, and am informed, that I may have the advantage of a legal trial.

"In the mean time, the only indulgence I have to ask is, that the public will suspend its judgment till such facts can be produced, from which alone the truth can appear; but if plans of a battle are to be referred to, which can give no just idea of it; if dispositions of the cavalry and infantry are supposed, which never existed; if orders for attacks and pursuits are quoted, which never were delivered; and if disobedience to those imaginary orders are asserted as a crime, what can an injured officer, under such circumstances, have recourse to, but claiming that justice, which is due to every Englishman, of being heard before he is condemned: the sooner that happens, the happier I shall be, as I am conscious my innocence must appear, when real facts are truly stated and fully proved.

GEORGE SACKVILLE."

This address, however, though extremely well approved by every man of sense and reflection, was not able to stem the torrent of popular prejudice, which flowed against him with irresistible impetuosity. He might, therefore, have retired in quiet and safety, and left it to ebb at leisure. This would have been generally deemed a prudential step, by all those who considered the unfavourable medium through which every particular of his conduct must have been viewed at that juncture, even by men who cherished the most candid intentions; when they reflected upon the power, influence, and popularity of his accuser; the danger of aggravating the resentment of the people, already too conspicuous, and the risque of hazarding his life on the honour and integrity of witnesses, who might think their fortunes depended upon the nature of the evidence they should give. Notwithstanding those suggestions, lord George, seemingly impatient of the imputation under which his character laboured, insisted upon the privilege of a legal trial, which was granted accordingly, after the judges had given it as their opinion, that he might be tried by a court-martial, though he no longer retained any commission in the service. A court of general officers being appointed and assembled to enquire into his conduct, the judge-advocate informed the court, that lord George was charged with having disobeyed the orders of prince Ferdinand, relative to the battle of Minden.

In order to give the reader a more distinct view of the charge, it is necessary to remind him that lord George Sackville commanded the cavalry of the right wing, consisting of Hanoverian and British horse, disposed in two lines, the British being at the extremity on the right, extending to the village of Hartum; the Hanoverian cavalry forming the left, that reached almost to an open wood or grove, which divided the horse from the line of infantry, particularly from that part of the line of infantry consisting of two brigades of British foot, the Hanoverian guards, and Hardenberg's regiment. This was the body of troops which sustained the brunt of the battle with the most incredible courage and perseverance. They, of their own accord, advanced to attack the left of the enemy's cavalry, through a most dreadful fire of artillery and small-arms, to which they were exposed in front and flank; they withstood the repeated attacks of the whole French gendarmerie, whom, at length, they totally routed, together with a body of Saxon troops on their left; and to their valour the victory was chiefly owing. The ground from which these troops advanced was a kind of heath or plain which opened a considerable way to the left, where the rest of the army was formed in order of battle; but on the right it was bounded by the wood, on the other side of which the cavalry of the right wing was posted, having in front the village of Halen, from whence the French had been driven by the piquets in the army there posted, and in front of them a windmill, situated in the middle space between them and a battery placed on the left of the enemy.

Early in the morning captain Malhorti had, by order of prince Ferdinand, posted the cavalry of the right wing in the situation we have just described, the village of Hartum with inclosures on the right, a narrow wood on the left, the village of Halen in their front, and a windmill in the middle of an open plain, which led directly to the enemy. In this position lord George Sackville was directed to remain until he should receive further orders; and here it was those orders were given which he was said to have disobeyed. Indeed, he was previously charged with having neglected the orders of the preceding evening, which imported, that the horses should be saddled at one in the morning, though the tents were not to be struck, nor the troops under arms, until they should receive further orders. He was accused of having disobeyed these orders, and of having come late into the field, after the cavalry was formed.

Captain Winchgrode, aid-du-camp to prince Ferdinand, declared upon oath, that while the infantry of the right wing were advancing towards the enemy for the second time, he was sent with orders to lord George Sackville to advance with the cavalry of the right wing, and sustain the infantry, which was going to engage, by forming the horse under his command, upon the heath, in a third line behind the regiments: that he delivered these orders to lord George Sackville, giving him to understand, that he should march the cavalry through the wood or trees on his left, to the heath where they were to be formed: that, on his return to the heath, he met colonel Fitzroy at full gallop towards lord George; and that he (Winchgrode) followed him back in order to hasten the march of the cavalry.

Colonel Ligonier, another of the prince's aids-du-camp, deposed, that he carried orders from the general to lord George to advance with the cavalry, in order to take advantage of the disorder which which appeared in the enemy's cavalry: that lord George made no answer to these orders, but turning to the troops, commanded them to draw their swords and march: that the colonel seeing them advance a few paces on the right forwards, told his lordship that he should march to the left: that, in the mean time, colonel Fitzroy arriving with orders for the British cavalry only to advance, lord George said the orders were contradictory, and colonel Ligonier replied they differed only in numbers; but the destination of his march was the same, to the left.

Colonel Fitzroy, the third aid du camp to prince Ferdinand, gave evidence, that when he told lord George it was the prince's order for the British cavalry to advance towards the left, his lordship observed, that it was different from the order brought by colonel Ligonier, and he could not think the prince intended to break the line: that he asked which way the cavalry was to march, and who was to be their guide: that when he (the aid du camp) offered to lead the column through the wood on the left, his lordship seemed still dissatisfied with the order, saying it did not agree with the order brought by colonel Ligonier, and desired to be conducted in person to the prince, that he might have an explanation from his own mouth; a resolution which was immediately executed. The next evidence, a colonel in the army, made oath, that, in his opinion, when the orders were delivered to lord George, his lordship was alarmed to a very great degree, and seemed to be in the utmost confusion.

A certain nobleman, of high rank and unblemished reputation, declared, that captain Winchingrode having told him it was absolutely necessary that the cavalry should march and form a line, to support the foot, he had given orders to the second line to march: that, as soon as they arrived at the place where the action began, he was met by colonel Fitzroy with an order for the cavalry to advance as fast as possible: that, in marching to this place, an order came to halt, until they could be joined by the first line of cavalry: that afterwards, in advancing, they were again halted by lord George Sackville: that, in his opinion, they might have marched with more expedition, and even come up in time enough to act against the enemy: some other officers, who were examined on this subject, agreed with the marquis in these sentiments.

Lord George in his defence proved, by undeniable evidence, that he never received the orders issued on the eve of the battle, nor any sort of intimation or plan of action, although he was certainly intitled to some such communication as commander in chief of the British forces; that, nevertheless, the orders concerning the horses were obeyed by those who received them: that lord George, instead of loitering or losing time while the troops were forming, prepared to put himself at the head of the cavalry on the first notice that they were in motion: that he was so eager to perform his duty, as to set out from his quarters without even waiting for an aid du camp to attend him, and was in the field before any general officer of his division: that, when captain Winchingrode delivered the order to form the cavalry in one line, making a third, to advance and sustain the infantry, he neither heard him say he was to march by the left, nor saw him point with his sword to the wood through which he was to pass: that neither of these directions were observed by the aids du camp or officers then present, except one gentleman, the person who bore witness to the confusion in the looks and deportment of his lordship: that the nearest and most practicable way of advancing against the enemy was by the way of the windmill, to the left of the village of Halen: that lord George imagined this was the only way by which he could be ordered to advance: that, in this persuasion, he had sent an officer to reconnoitre the village of Halen as an object of importance, as it would have been upon the flank of the cavalry in advancing forwards: that when he received the order from Winchingrode to form the line and advance, he still imagined this was his route, and on this supposition immediately detached an aid du camp to remove a regiment of Saxe Gotha which was in the front: that he sent a second to observe the place where the infantry were, and a third to reconnoitre the enemy: that, in a few minutes, colonel Ligonier coming up with an order from prince Ferdinand to advance the cavalry, his lordship immediately drew his sword, and ordered them to march forward by the windmill: that, with regard to what the colonel said, that, upon his delivering the order, he added, "by the left!" lord George heard no such directions; nor did it reach the ears of any other person then present except of that officer who witnessed to the same direction given by Winchingrode: that immediately after the troops were put in motion, colonel Fitzroy arrived with an order from prince Ferdinand, importing, that the British cavalry only should advance by the left: that lord George declared their orders were contradictory, and seemed the more puzzled, as he understood that both these gentlemen came off nearly at the same time from the prince, and were probably directed to communicate the same order: that it was therefore natural to suppose there was a mistake, as there might be great danger in breaking the line, as the route by the wood appeared more difficult and tedious than that by the windmill, which led directly through open ground to the enemy; and as he could not think that if a body of horse was immediately wanted, the general would send for the British that were at the farthest extremity of the wing, rather than for the Hanoverian cavalry, who formed the left of the line, and consequently were much nearer the scene of action: that lord George in this uncertainty resolved to apply for an explanation to the prince in person, who he understood was at a small distance: that, with this view, he set out with all possible expedition: that having entered the wood, and perceived that the country beyond it opened sooner to the left than he imagined, and captain Smith, his aid du camp, advising that the British cavalry should be put in motion, he sent back that gentleman with orders for them to advance by the left with all possible dispatch: that he rode up to the general, who received him without any marks of displeasure, and ordered him to bring up the whole cavalry of the right wing in a line upon the heath; an order, the reader will perceive, quite different from that which was so warmly espoused by the aid du camp: that as the marquis of Granby had already put the second line in motion, according to a separate order which he had received, and the head of his column was already in view coming out of the wood, lord George thought it necessary to halt the troops on the left until the right should come into the line, and afterwards send them orders to march slower, that two regiments which had been thrown out of the line might have an opportunity to replace themselves in their proper stations.

With regard to the confusion which one officer pretended to have perceived in the countenance and deportment of this commander, a considerable number of other officers then present, being interrogated by his lordship, unanimously declared that they saw no such marks of confusion, but that he delivered his orders with all the marks of coolness and deliberation. The candid reader will of himself determine, whether a man's heart is to be judged by any change of his complexion, granting such a change to have happened: whether the evidence of one witness, in such a case, will weigh against the concurrent testimony of all the officers, whose immediate business it was to attend and observe the commander: whether it was likely that an officer, who had been more than once in actual service, and behaved without reproach, so as to attain such an eminent rank in the army, should exhibit symptoms of fear and confusion, when there was in reality no appearance of danger; for none of these orders imported he should attack the enemy, but only advance to sustain the infantry.

The time which elapsed from the first order he received by captain Winchgrode, to the arrival of colonel Ligonier, did not exceed eight minutes, during which his aid du camp, captain Hugo, was employed in removing the Saxe Gotha regiment from the front, by which he proposed to advance. From that period till the cavalry actually marched, in consequence of an order from lord George, the length of time was differently estimated in the opinions of different witnesses, but, at a medium, computed by the judge-advocate at fifteen minutes, during which the following circumstances were transacted: the troops were first ordered to advance forwards, then halted; the contradictory orders arrived and were disputed; the commander desired the two aids du camp to agree about which was the precise order, and he would obey it immediately; each insisting upon that which he had delivered, lord George hastened to the general for an explanation; and as he passed the wood, sent back captain Smith to the right of the cavalry, which was at a considerable distance, to put the British horse in motion.

I shall not pretend to determine whether the commander of such an important body may be excusable for hesitating, when he receives contradictory orders at the same time, especially when both orders run counter to his own judgment; whether in that case it is allowable for him to suspend the operation for a few minutes, in order to consult in person the commander in chief about a step of such consequence to the preservation of the whole army. Neither will I venture to decide dogmatically on the merits of the march, after the cavalry were put in motion; whether they marched too slow, or were unnecessarily halted in their way to the heath.

It was proved indeed that lord George was always remarkably slow in his movements of cavalry, on the supposition that if horses are blown, they must be unfit for service, and that the least hurry is apt to disorder the line of horse to such a degree, as would rob them of their proper effect, and render all their efforts abortive. This being the system of lord George Sackville, it may deserve consideration, whether he could deviate from it on this delicate occasion, without renouncing the dictates of his own judgment and discretion; and whether he was at liberty to use his own judgment, after having received the order to advance.

After all, whether he was intentionally guilty, and what were the motives by which he was really actuated, are questions which his own conscience alone can solve. Even granting him to have hesitated from perplexity; to have lingered from vexation; to have failed through error of judgment; he will probably find favour with the candid and humane part of his fellow-subjects, when they reflect upon the nature of his situation, placed at the head of such a body of cavalry, uninstructed and uninformed of plan or circumstance, divided from the rest of the army, unacquainted with the operations of the day, chagrined with doubt and disappointment, and perplexed by contradictory orders, neither of which he could execute without offering violence to his own judgment; when they consider the endeavours he used to manifest his obedience; the last distinct order, which he in person received and executed; that mankind are liable to mistakes; that the cavalry were not originally intended to act, as appears in the account of the battle published at the Hague by the authority of prince Ferdinand, expressly declaring that the cavalry on the right did not act, because it was destined to sustain the infantry in a third line; that if it had really been designed for action, it ought either to have been posted in another place, or permitted to advance strait forwards by the windmill, according to the idea of its commander: finally, when they recal to view the general confusion that seems to have prevailed through the manoeuvres of that morning, and remember some particulars of the action; that the brigades of British artillery had no orders until they applied to lord George Sackville, who directed them to the spot where they acquitted themselves with so much honour and effect, in contributing to the success of the day; that the glory and advantage acquired by the few brigades of infantry, who may be said to have defeated the whole French army, was in no respect owing to any general or particular orders or instructions, but entirely flowing from the native valour of the troops, and the spirited conduct of their immediate commanders; and that a great number of officers in the allied army, even of those who remained on the open heath, never saw the face of the enemy, or saw them at such a distance that they could not distinguish more than the hats and the arms of the British regiments with which they were engaged. With respect to the imputation of cowardice levelled at lord George by the unthinking multitude, and circulated with such industry and clamour, we ought to consider it as a mob-accusation, which the bravest of men, even the great duke of Marlborough, could not escape: we ought to receive it as a dangerous suspicion, which strikes at the root of character, and may blast that honour in a moment, which the soldier has acquired in a long course of painful service, at the continual hazard of his life: we ought to distrust it as a malignant charge, altogether inconsistent with the former conduct of the person accused, as well as with his subsequent impatience and perseverance in demanding a trial, to which he never would have been called; a trial which, tho' his life was at stake, and his cause out of countenance, he sustained with such courage, fortitude, and presence of mind, as even his enemies themselves could not help admiring. It ought likewise to be observed in his favour, that the only person who witnessed to the confusion in his countenance, and of consequence may be supposed to have been the author of this malicious report, was himself guilty of the very same disobedience to orders of which he accused his superior; and the intelligent reader will, from this circumstance, judge what credit is due to the evidence of such a witness, especially when contradicted by the concurrent testimony of so many other gentlemen.

The court-martial, however, having examined the evidence, and heard the defence, gave judgment in these words: "The court, upon due consideration of the whole matter before them, is of opinion, that lord George Sackville is guilty of having disobeyed the orders of prince Ferdinand of Brunswic, whom he was by his commission and instructions directed to obey as commander in chief, according to the rules of war; and it is the farther opinion of this court, that lord George Sackville is, and he is hereby adjudged, unfit to serve his majesty in any military capacity whatsoever." This sentence was confirmed by the king, who moreover signified his pleasure, that it should be given out in public orders, not only in Britain, but in America, and every quarter of the globe where any English troops happened to be, that officers, being convinced that neither high birth nor great employments can shelter offences of such a nature; and that seeing they are subject to censures, much worse than death to a man who has any sense of honour, they may avoid the fatal consequences arising from disobedience of orders. To complete the disgrace of this unfortunate general, his majesty in council called for the council-book, and ordered the name of lord George Sackville to be struck out of the list of privy-counsellors.

This trial was succeeded by another of a still more important nature. Laurence Shirley, earl Ferrers, a nobleman of a violent spirit, who had committed many outrages, and, in the opinion of all who knew him, given manifold proofs of insanity, at length perpetrated a murder which subjected him to the cognizance of the law. His deportment to his lady was so brutal, that application had been made to the house of peers, and a separation effected by act of parliament. Trustees were nominated; and one Mr. Johnson, who had, during the best part of his life, been employed in the family, was now appointed receiver of the estates, at the earl's own request. The conduct of this man in the course of his stewardship gave umbrage to lord Ferrers, whose disposition was equally jealous and vindictive. He imagined all his own family had conspired against his interest, and that Johnson was one of their accomplices; that he had been instrumental in obtaining the act of parliament, which his lordship considered as a grievous hardship; that he had disappointed him in regard to a certain contract about coal-mines: in a word, that there was a collusion between Johnson and the earl's adversaries. Inflamed with these suppositions, he first expressed his resentment by giving Johnson notice to quit the farm which he possessed on the estate; but finding the trustees had confirmed the lease, he determined to gratify his revenge by assassination, and laid his plan accordingly.

On Sunday the thirteenth of January he appointed this unhappy man to come to his house on the Friday following, in order to peruse papers, or settle accompts; and Johnson went thither without the least suspicion of what was prepared for his reception: for although he was no stranger to his lordship's dangerous disposition, and knew he had some time before incurred his displeasure, yet he imagined his resentment had entirely subsided, as the earl had of late behaved to him with remarkable complacency. He therefore at the time appointed repaired to his lordship's house of Stanton in Leicestershire, at the distance of a short mile from his own habitation, and was admitted by a maid servant. The earl had dismissed every person in the house, upon various pretences, except three women who were left in the kitchen. Johnson advancing to the door of the apartment, was received by his lordship, who desired him to walk into another room, where he joined him in a few minutes, and then the door was locked on the inside. After a great deal of warm expostulation, the earl insisted upon his subscribing a paper, confessing himself a villain; and on his refusing to comply with this demand, declared he would put him to death. In vain the unfortunate man remonstrated against this cruel resolution, and deprecated the indignation of this furious nobleman. He remained deaf to all his intreaties, drew forth a pistol which he had loaded for the purpose, and commanding him to implore heaven's mercy on his knees, shot him through the body while he remained in that supplicating posture. The consequence of this violence was not immediate death; but his lordship seeing the wretched victim still alive and sensible, though agonized with pain, felt a momentary emotion of pity. He ordered his servants to convey Mr. Johnson up stairs to a bed, to send for a surgeon, and give immediate notice of the accident to the wounded man's family. When Mr. Johnson's daughter came to the house, she was met by the earl, who told her he had shot her father on purpose, and with deliberation.

The same declaration he made to the surgeon at his arrival. He stood by him while he examined the wound, described the direction of the ball, and seemed surprised that it had not penetrated through the body. When he demanded the surgeon's opinion of the wound, the operator thought proper to temporize, for his own safety as well as for the sake of the public, lest the earl should take some other desperate step, or endeavour to escape. He therefore amused him with hopes of Johnson's recovery, about which he now seemed extremely anxious. He supported his spirits by immoderate drinking, after having retired to another apartment with the surgeon, whom he desired to take all possible care of his patient. He declared, however, that he did not repent of what he had done; that Johnson was a villain, who deserved to die; that in case of his death he (the earl) would surrender himself to the house of peers, and take his trial. He said he could justify the action to his own conscience; and owned his intention was to have killed Johnson outright; but as he still survived, and was in pain, he desired that all possible means might be used for his recovery.

Nor did he seem altogether neglectful of his own safety: he endeavoured to tamper with the surgeon, and enquired what evidence he would give when called before a court of justice. He continued to drink himself into a state of intoxication, and all the cruelty of his hate seemed to return. He would not allow the wounded man to be removed to his own house, saying, he would keep him under his own roof that he might plague the villain. He returned to the chamber where Johnson lay, insulted him with the most opprobrious language, threatened to shoot him through the head, and could hardly be restrained from committing further acts of violence on the poor man, who was already in extremity. After he retired to bed, the surgeon procured a sufficient number of assistants, who conveyed Mr. Johnson in an easy chair to his own house, where he expired about nine in the morning. The same surgeon assembled a number of armed men to seize the murderer, who at first threatened resistance, but was soon apprehended, endeavouring to make his escape, and committed to the county prison. From thence he was conveyed to London by the gaoler of Leicester, and conducted by the usher of the black rod and his deputy into the house of lords, where the coroner's inquest, and the affidavits touching the murder being read, the gaoler delivered up his prisoner to the care of the black rod, and he was immediately committed to the Tower. He appeared very calm, composed, and unconcerned, from the time of his being apprehended; conversed coolly on the subject of his imprisonment; made very pertinent remarks upon the nature of the habeas corpus act of parliament, of which he hoped to avail himself; and when they withdrew from the house of peers, desired he might not be visited by any of his relations or acquaintances. His understanding, which was naturally good, had been well cultivated; his arguments were rational, but his conduct was frantic.

The circumstances of this assassination appeared so cruel and deliberate, that the people cried aloud for justice; and the government gave up the offender to the laws of his country. The lord-keeper Henley was appointed lord high steward for the trial of earl Ferrers, and sat in state with all the peers and judges in Westminster-hall, which was for this purpose converted into a very august tribunal. On the sixteenth day of April the delinquent was brought from the Tower in a coach, attended by the major of the Tower, the gentleman-gaoler, the wardours, and a detachment of the footguards. He was brought into court about ten; and the lord steward with the peers taking their places, he was arraigned aloud, in the midst of an infinite multitude of people, including many foreigners, who seemed wonderfully struck with the grandeur and magnificence of the scene. The murder was fully proved by unquestionable evidence:

but the earl pleaded insanity of mind; and, in order to make good this plea, called many witnesses to attest his lunacy in a variety of instances, which seemed too plainly to indicate a disordered imagination: unfounded jealousy of plots and conspiracies, unconnected ravings, fits of musing, incoherent ejaculations, sudden starts of fury, denunciations of unprovoked revenge, frantic gesticulations, and a strange caprice of temper, were proved to have distinguished his conduct and deportment.

It appeared that lunacy had been a family taint, and affected several of his lordship's relations; that one of them in particular, a solicitor of reputation, had renounced his business, on the full persuasion of his being disordered in his brain; that, long before this unhappy event, his nearest relations had deliberated upon the expediency of taking out a commission of lunacy against him, and were prevented by no other consideration than the fear of being sued for scandalum magnatum, should the jury find his lordship compos mentis; a circumstance which in all probability would have happened, inasmuch as the earl's madness did not appear in his conversation, but in his conduct. A physician of eminence, whose practice was confined to persons labouring under this infirmity, declared that the particulars of the earl's deportment, and personal behaviour, seemed to indicate lunacy. Indeed, all his neighbours and acquaintance had long considered him as a madman; and a certain noble lord is said to have declared in the house of peers, when the bill of separation was on the carpet, that he looked upon him in the light of a maniac; and that, if some effectual step was not taken to deprive him of the power of doing mischief, he did not doubt but that they would one day have occasion to try him for murder.

The lawyers for the crown endeavoured to invalidate the proofs of his lunacy, by observing, that his lordship was never so much deprived of his reason but that he could distinguish between good and evil: that the murder he had committed was the effect of revenge, for a conceived injury of some standing: that the malice was deliberate, and the plan artfully conducted: that immediately after the deed was perpetrated, the earl's conversation and reasoning was cool and consistent, until he drank himself into a state of intoxication: that, in the opinion of the greatest lawyers, no criminal can avail himself of the plea of lunacy, provided the crime was committed during a lucid interval; but his lordship, far from exhibiting any marks of insanity, had, in the course of his trial, displayed uncommon understanding and sagacity in examining the witnesses, and making many shrewd and pertinent observations on the evidence which was given.

These sentiments coincided with the opinion of the peers, who unanimously declared him guilty. The trial lasted two days; and on the third the lord-steward, after having made a short speech concerning the heinous nature of the offence, pronounced the same sentence of death upon the earl which malefactors of the lowest class undergo; namely, that from the Tower, in which he was imprisoned, he should, on the Monday following, be led to the common place of execution, there to be hanged by the neck, and his body be afterwards dissected and anatomized. This last part of the sentence seemed to shock the criminal extremely; he changed colour, his jaw quivered, and he appeared to be in great agitation; but during the remaining part of his life he behaved with surprising composure, and even unconcern. After he had received sentence, the lords his judges, by a power vested in them, respited his execution for one month, that he might have time to settle his temporal and spiritual concerns.

Before sentence was passed, the earl read a paper, in which he begged pardon of their lordships for the trouble he had given, as well as for having, against his own inclination, pleaded lunacy at the request of his friends. He thanked them for the candid trial with which he had been indulged, and intreated their lordships to recommend him to the king for mercy. He afterwards sent a letter to his majesty, remonstrating, that he was the representative of a very ancient and honourable family, which had been allied to the crown; and requesting that, if he could not be favoured with the species of death which in cases of treason distinguishes the nobleman from the plebeian, he might at least, out of consideration of his family, be allowed to suffer in the Tower, rather than at the common place of execution: but this indulgence was refused. From his return to the Tower, to the day of his execution, he betrayed no mark of apprehension or impatience; but regulated his affairs with precision, and conversed without concern or restraint.

On the fifth day of May, his body being demanded by the sheriffs at the Tower-gate, in consequence of a writ under the great seal of England, directed to the lieutenant of the Tower, his lordship desired permission to go in his own landau, and appeared gaily dressed in a light-coloured suit of cloaths, embroidered with silver. He was attended in the landau by Mr. sheriff Vaillant and the chaplain of the Tower, followed by the chariots of the sheriffs, a mourning coach and six filled with his friends, and a hearse for the conveyance of his body. He was guarded by a posse of constables, a party of horse grenadiers, and a detachment of infantry; and in this manner the procession moved from the Tower, through an infinite concourse of people, to Tyburn, where the gallows, and a scaffold erected under it, appeared covered with black bays. The earl behaved with great composure to Mr. sheriff Vaillant: he observed, that the gaiety of his apparel might seem odd on such an occasion; but that he had particular reasons for wearing that suit of cloaths: he took notice of the vast multitude which crowded around him, brought thither, he supposed, by curiosity to see a nobleman hanged: he told the sheriff he had applied to the king by letter, that he might be permitted to die in the Tower, where the earl of Essex, one of his ancestors, had been beheaded in the reign of queen Elizabeth; an indulgence which, he said, he had the greater reason to hope would be granted, as he had the honour to quarter part of his majesty's arms. He expressed some displeasure at being executed as a common felon, exposed to the eyes of such a multitude.

The chaplain, who had never been admitted to him before, observing that some account of his lordship's sentiments on religion would be expected by the public, he made answer, that he did not think himself accountable to the public for his private sentiments: that he had always adored one God, the creator of the universe; and, with respect to any particular opinions of his own, he had never propagated them, or endeavoured to make proselytes; because he thought it was criminal to disturb the established religion of his country, as lord Bolingbroke had done by the publication of his writings. He added, that the great number of sects, and the multiplication of religious disputes, had almost banished morality. With regard to the crime for which he suffered, he declared that he had no malice against Mr. Johnson; and that the murder was owing to a perturbation of mind, occasioned by a variety of crosses and vexations. When he approached the place of execution, he expressed an earnest desire to see and take leave of a certain person who waited in a coach; a person, he said, for whom he had the most sincere regard and affection; but the sheriff prudently suggesting that such an interview might unman him, at a time when he had occasion for all his fortitude and resolution, he acquiesced in the justness of the remark, and delivered to him a pocket-book, a ring, and a purse, desiring they might be given to that person, whom he now declined seeing.

On his arrival at Tyburn he came out of the landau, and ascended the scaffold with a firm step and undaunted countenance. He refused to join the chaplain in his devotions; but, kneeling with him on black cushions, he repeated the Lord's Prayer, which he said he had always admired; and added with great energy, "O Lord, forgive me all my errors, pardon all my sins." After this exercise, he presented his watch to Mr. sheriff Vaillant, thanked him and the other gentlemen for all their civilities; and signified his desire of being buried at Breden, or Stanton, in Leicestershire. Finally, he gratified the executioner with a purse of money; then the halter being adjusted to his neck, he stepped upon a little stage, erected upon springs, on the middle of the scaffold; and, the cap being pulled over his eyes, the sheriff made a signal, at which the stage fell from under his feet, and left him suspended in the air. His body having hung an hour and five minutes, was cut down, placed in the hearse, and conveyed to the public theatre for dissection, where being opened, and lying for some days as the subject of a public lecture, at length it was carried off and privately interred.

In the month of August a remarkable act of desperate revenge was perpetrated by one Stirn, a native of Hesse Cassel, inflamed and exasperated by a false punctilio of honour. This unhappy young man was descended of a good family, and possessed many accomplishments both of body and mind; but his character was distinguished by such a jealous sensibility, as rendered him unhappy in himself, and disagreeable to his companions. After having lived for some years as usher in a boarding-school, he was admitted into the house of one Mr. Matthews, a surgeon, in order to teach him the classics, and instruct his children in music, which he perfectly understood. He had not long resided in this family, when the surgeon took umbrage at some part of his conduct, taxed him roughly with fraud and ingratitude, and insisted upon his removing to another lodging. Whether he rejected this intimation, or found difficulty in procuring another apartment, the surgeon resolved to expel him by violence, called in the assistance of a peace officer, and turned him out into the street in the night, after having loaded him with the most provoking reproaches.

These injuries and disgraces operating upon a mind jealous by nature, and galled by adversity, produced a kind of phrenzy of resentment; and he took the desperate resolution of sacrificing Matthews to his revenge. Next day, having procured a case of pistols, and charged them for the occasion, he reinforced his rage by drinking an unusual quantity of wine, and repaired in the evening to a public house which Mr. Matthews frequented, in the neighbourhood of Hatton Garden. There he accordingly found the unhappy victim sitting with some of his friends; and the surgeon, instead of palliating his former conduct, began to insult him afresh, saying he was a dirty fellow, and that he ought to be sent back to his own lousy country. Stirn, exasperated by this additional indignity, pulled his pistols from his bosom, shot the surgeon, who immediately expired, and discharged the other at his own breast, though his confusion was such that he missed of his aim. He was apprehended on the spot, and conveyed to prison, where for some days he refused all kind of sustenance, but afterwards became more composed. At his trial he pleaded insanity of mind; but being found guilty, he resolved to anticipate the execution of the sentence. That same evening he drank poison; and notwithstanding all the remedies that could be administered, died in strong convulsions. His body was publicly dissected, according to the sentence of the law, and afterwards interred with those marks of indignity which are reserved for the perpetrators of suicide. It does not appear what reason Matthews had for accusing Stirn of the crimes which he laid to his charge; but Stirn solemnly declared in his last moments that there was none. He expressed many obligations to one Mr. Crawford, with whom he had lived as usher, and who often visited him in prison with great kindness and humanity. He was possessed of good natural parts, improved by an excellent education; and perhaps, had he been in a condition more suitable not only to his hopes, but to his birth and merit, he would have been less jealous of affronts; and, conscious of undisputed dignity, would have treated rudeness and slander with contempt, instead of pursuing them with revenge.

In the month of October the attention of the public was strongly engaged by a private, but interesting event, namely, the death of one Miss Bell, an unfortunate young creature of a good family, who had renounced her father's house, and embraced the wretched life of a common prostitute. She died at a lodging-house in Marybone, having declared on her death-bed to an officer of her acquaintance, who visited her from a motive of humanity, that she had received her death's wound at a bagnio from a certain young gentleman, who seemed to have mangled her out of meer wantonness of brutality. She not only persisted in repeating this declaration before divers persons, but conjured the officer to see justice done upon the villain who had treated her so inhumanly. Her complaint was corroborated by the asseveration of her own maid and attendant, who bore witness to her being wounded in two different places. These circumstances made such an impression upon the gentleman, that he applied to a justice of the peace, and obtained an order for taking up her body after she was buried, that it might be subjected to the cognizance of the coroner and his inquest; it accordingly underwent an examination, and was re-interred, after the jury had given their verdict that she died a natural death.

The officer, who, though in attendance, had not been examined, was not satisfied with this decision, and resolved to promote a further enquiry: he wrote to the young woman's father, as well as to the person accused, who had retired to the country, and declared that he would submit himself to a fair trial, that his character might be vindicated to the satisfaction of the public. Accordingly, when the father commenced a prosecution, he surrendered himself before five justices of the peace in Westminster, who having examined a great number of witnesses, were of opinion that the warrant should be discharged. As a pamphlet, containing an account of the death of Miss Bell, had been published, and without doubt given a bad impression of this gentleman, he prosecuted the officer in the King's Bench for having published a libel against him; but the information was set aside, and the judge ordered the prosecutor to be tried at the Old Bailey for murder. He was brought to the bar of that tribunal in the month of February, and, after a long hearing, acquitted. By part of the evidence it appeared there was reason to believe the unfortunate deceased was actually delirious when she made the complaint to the officer: the nurse contradicted the evidence of that gentleman: the servants of the bagnio declared that no wounds had been given at the time when the tragedy was said to have been acted: the apothecary who attended her in her last moments affirmed, that the wounds could not be the cause of her death, but actually preserved her from dying of a mortification; and the physician gave it as his opinion, that the supposed wounds were no other than abscesses, formed by an effort of nature to relieve itself. Had they really been wounds, there would be little reason to suppose they were the immediate cause of her death, as no considerable vessel had been hurt, nor any of the bowels injured; but, that the infliction of such wounds, co-operating with other acts of barbarity, blows, stripes, and bruises, might in a body incensed with rage, and inflamed with intoxication, produce a fever that would terminate in death, is a possibility to which every judicious physician must subscribe; and in that case, he who inflicted the wounds and bruises, who aroused the resentment, and promoted the intoxication of the deceased, cannot justly be pronounced innocent of her death. The person, however, accused of the murder, was finally acquitted, though by no means to the satisfaction of the public.

The royal society having made application to the king, representing that there would be a transit of Venus over the disk of the sun, on the sixth day of June; and that there was reason to hope the parallax of that planet might be more accurately determined by making proper observations of this phenomenon at the island of St. Helena, near the coast coast of Africa, and at Bencoolen in the East Indies; his majesty granted a sum of money to defray the expence of sending able astronomers to these two places, and ordered a ship of war to be equipped for their conveyance. Accordingly, Mr. Nevil Maskelyne and Mr. Robert Waddington were appointed to make the observations at St. Helena; and Mr. Charles Mason and Mr. Jeremiah Dixon undertook the voyage to Bencoolen on the island of Sumatra †.

I shall conclude the domestic occurrences of this year with an account of two incidents, which, tho' of a very different nature in respect of each other, concurred nevertheless in demonstrating that the internal wealth and vigour of the nation were neither drained nor diminished by the enormous expence and inconveniencies of the war. The committee appointed to manage the undertaking for a new bridge over the river Thames at Blackfriars having received and examined a variety of plans, presented by different artists, at length gave the preference to the design of one Mr. Mylne, a young architect, a native of North Britain, just returned from the prosecution of his studies at Rome, where he had gained the prize in the Capitol, which the academy of that city bestows on him who produces the most beautiful and useful plan on a given subject of architecture. This young man being at London, in his return to his own country, was advised to declare himself a candidate for the superintendency of the new bridge; and the plan which he presented was approved and adopted. The place being already ascertained, the lord-mayor of London, accompanied by the committee and a great concourse of people, repaired to Blackfriars, and laid the first stone of the bridge, placing upon it a plate with an inscription, which does more honour to the public spirit of the undertakers than to the classical taste of the author.

The other instance that denoted the wealth and spirit of the nation, was the indifference and unconcern with which they bore the loss of a vast magazine of naval stores, belonging to the dock-yard at Portsmouth, which in the month of July was set on fire by lightning, and being composed of combustibles, burned with such fury, notwithstanding all the endeavours of the workmen in the yard, the sailors in the harbour, and the troops in the town, that before a stop was put to the conflagration, it had destroyed a variety of stores, to an immense value. The damage, however, was so immediately repaired, that it had no sort of effect in disconcerting any plan, or even in retarding any naval preparation.

† In the beginning of April the king granted to his grandson, prince Edward-Augustus, and to the heirs-male of his royal highness, the dignities of duke of the kingdom of Great Britain, and of earl of the kingdom of Ireland, by the names, styles, and titles, of duke of York and Albany, and of earl of Ulster.

III.

A. D. 1760.

THE decease of his late majesty was no sooner known than Mr. Pitt, one of the principal secretaries of state, repaired to Kew, and communicated the tidings to his new sovereign, George the Third, who thus ascended the throne in the twenty-third year of his age. The lords of the privy-council were immediately assembled; and next day his majesty was proclaimed before Saville-house in Leicester-fields, in presence of the great officers of state, the nobility, the lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, and a great number of persons of distinction. The same ceremony was performed, with the usual solemnities, in different parts of the capital, which resounded with joy and acclamation.

The council being assembled at Charlton-house, the king addressed himself to them in the following terms: "The loss that I and the nation have suffered by the death of the king my grandfather, would have been severely felt at any time; but coming at so critical a juncture, and so unexpected, it is by many circumstances augmented; and the weight now falling upon me, much increased, I feel my own insufficiency to support it as I wish: but animated by the tenderest affection for this my native country, and depending on the advice, experience, and abilities of your lordships, the support and assistance of every honest man, I enter with chearfulness into this arduous situation, and shall make it the business of my life to promote, in every thing, the glory and happiness of these kingdoms; to preserve and strengthen the constitution, both in church and state; and as I mount the throne in the midst of an expensive, but just and necessary war, I shall endeavour to prosecute it in the manner the most likely to bring about an honourable and lasting peace, in concert with my allies." This declaration implying a resolution to prosecute the same measures which had been planned under the late king, was published at the request of the lords assembled in council, and effectually quelled the apprehensions of all those who dreaded an alteration.

His majesty now took and signed the oath relating to the security of the church of Scotland, and subscribed two instruments thereof, in presence of the lords of council, by whom they were witnessed. One of those was transmitted to the court of sessions, to be recorded in the books of Sederunt, and afterwards lodged in the public register of Scotland; the other remained among the records of the council. The two houses of parliament being assembled, the members were sworn in; the peers by the lord-keeper; the commons before the duke duke of Rutland, lord-steward: after which both houses were adjourned.

The first specimen which his majesty gave of his excellent disposition, was a proclamation which he issued for the encouragement of piety and virtue, and the preventing and punishing of vice, profaneness, and immorality. It was expressed in the following terms: "We most seriously and religiously considering, that it is an indispensable duty on us to be careful, above all other things, to preserve and advance the honour and service of Almighty God, and to discourage all vice, profaneness, debauchery, and immorality, which are so highly displeasing to God, so great a reproach to our religion and government, and, by means of the frequent ill examples of the practices thereof, have so fatal a tendency to the corruption of many of our loving subjects, otherwise religiously and virtuously disposed; and which, if not timely remedied, may justly draw down the Divine vengeance on us and our kingdoms. We also humbly acknowledging, that we cannot expect the blessing and goodness of Almighty God (by whom kings reign, and on which we entirely rely) to make our reign happy and prosperous to ourselves and to our people, without a religious observance of God's holy laws: to the intent therefore, that religion, piety, and good manners, may, according to our most hearty desire, flourish and increase under our administration and government, we have thought fit, by the advice of our privy-council, to issue this our royal proclamation, and do hereby declare our royal purpose and resolution to discountenance and punish all manner of vice, profaneness, and immorality, in all persons, of whatsoever degree or quality, within this our realm, and particularly in such as are employed near our royal person; and that, for the encouragement of religion and morality, we will upon all occasions distinguish persons of piety and virtue, by marks of our royal favour. And we do expect and require, that all persons of honour, or in place of authority, will give good example by their virtue and piety, and to their utmost contribute to the discountenancing persons of dissolute and debauched lives, that they, being reduced by that means to shame and contempt, for their loose and evil actions and behaviour, may be thereby also enforced the sooner to reform their ill habits and practices, and that the visible displeasure of good men towards them may, as far as it is possible, supply what the laws probably cannot altogether prevent. And we do hereby strictly enjoin and prohibit all our loving subjects, of what degree or quality soever, from playing on the Lord's day at dice, cards, or any other game whatever, either in public or private houses, or any other places whatsoever; and we do hereby require and command them, and every of them, decently and reverently to attend the worship of God on every Lord's day, on pain of our highest displeasure, and of being proceeded against with the utmost rigour that may be by law. And for the more effectual reforming all such persons who, by reason of their dissolute lives and conversations, are a scandal to our kingdom; our further pleasure is, and we do hereby strictly charge and command all our judges, mayors, sheriffs, justices of the peace, and all other our officers and ministers, both ecclesiastical and civil, and all other our subjects whom it may concern, to be very vigilant and strict in the discovery, and the effectual prosecution and punishment of all persons who shall be guilty of excessive drinking, blasphemy, profane swearing and cursing, lewdness, profanation of the Lord's day, or other dissolute, immoral, or disorderly practices; and that they take care also effectually to suppress all public gaming-houses and places, and other lewd and disorderly houses, and to put in execution the statute made in the twenty-ninth year of the reign of the late king Charles II. entitled, An act for the better observation of the Lord's day commonly called Sunday: and also an act of parliament made in the ninth year of the reign of the late king William III. intitled, An act for the more effectual suppressing of blasphemy and profaneness; and all other laws now in force for the punishing and suppressing any of the vices aforesaid; and also to suppress and prevent all gaming whatsoever, in public or private houses, on the Lord's day; and likewise that they take effectual care to prevent all persons keeping taverns, chocolate-houses, coffee-houses, or other public houses whatsoever, from selling wine, chocolate, coffee, ale, beer, or other liquors, or receiving or permitting guests to be or remain in such their houses in the time of divine service on the Lord's day, as they will answer it to Almighty God, and upon pain of our highest displeasure. And for the more effectual proceeding herein, we also hereby direct and command all our judges of assizes, and justices of the peace, to give strict charges at their respective assizes and sessions, for the due prosecution and punishment of all persons that shall presume to offend in any of the kinds aforesaid; and also of all persons that, contrary to their duty, shall be remiss or negligent in putting the laws in execution; and that they do at their respective assizes and quarter-sessions of the peace, cause this our royal proclamation to be publicly read in open court, immediately before the charge is given. And we do hereby further charge and command every minister in his respective parish-church or chapel, to read, or cause to be read, this our proclamation, at least four times in every year, immediately after divine service, and to incite and stir up their respective auditors to the practice of piety and virtue, and the avoiding of all immorality and profaneness. And to the end that all vice and debauchery may be prevented, and religion and virtue practised by all officers, private soldiers, mariners, and others, who are employed in our service by sea and land, we do hereby strictly charge and command all our commanders and officers whatsoever, that they do take care to avoid all profaneness, debauchery, and other immoralities; and that, by their own good and virtuous lives and conversations, they do set good examples to all such as are under their care and authority; and likewise take care of and inspect the behaviour of all such as are under them, and punish all those who shall be guilty of any offences aforesaid, as they will be answerable for the ill consequences of their neglect herein. Given, &c."

This proclamation was immediately succeeded by another, requiring all persons who were in offices of authority or government, at the decease of the late king, to proceed in the execution of their respective offices. The tide of affection towards the

the young monarch began to run so high, that addresses, couched in the warmest professions of love and attachment, flowed in from every part of the kingdom. The magistrates of London led the way; and their example was followed by the merchants and traders of that city, amounting to such a number as had never before appeared on the like occasion. The clergy of London and Westminster, headed by the archbishop of Canterbury, payed their compliments to his majesty on his accession to the throne; and the two universities were not slow in presenting their addresses of congratulation. In a word, all the bodies politic and corporate, in all the cities and counties of the three kingdoms seemed to vie with each other in expressions of loyalty and affection to their new sovereign, who received them with such affability and marks of regard as could not but be extremely pleasing to a people remarkable for sensibility and sentiment.

On the tenth day of November, in the evening, the body of the late king was removed from Kensington to the apartment called the Prince's Chamber, near the house of peers, where it lay in state until next night, when it was interred with great funeral pomp, in the royal vault in the chapel of Henry the Seventh, adjoining to Westminster-abbey, the duke of Cumberland appearing in the character of chief mourner. These last duties to the deceased monarch being piously discharged, the eyes of the people were turned upon their youthful sovereign, who, some hoped, and many apprehended, would soon embrace a new system of politics. Nor did the different parties which had been so long silenced, and now began to revive in the nation, fail to recommend their favourite plans by every kind of argument and topic.

The grand contest which divided the two factions was, whether it was useful or expedient to adhere to our German connections. The enemies of these measures alleged, that by persisting in such a conduct, we evidently pursued a system by which we must lose all the advantages we acquired during the short time we followed one that was more rational and suitable to our circumstances; a system of all others the most absurd; a system, in which defeats were attended with their usual fatal effects, and in which even victory itself could not save us from ruin: that, not to enter into that long and vainly agitated question, whether we ought to take any part in the differences which may arise between the powers on the continent? this disquisition being foreign to the present purpose, and besides, being of too vague and general a nature to admit of any precise determination; this much might be asserted, that we could never engage in a continental war against France, without a concurrence in our favour of all the other powers on the continent: that this was the continental scheme of the great king William; and this principle the foundation of the grand alliance, which he projected, and at the head of which, in defence of the liberties of Europe, he made the most august appearance to which any monarch had ever been raised: that it was on this principle, in conjunction with half Europe, that we carried on the war with so much honour and success against France, under the great duke of Marlborough; but to engage in a continental war with that power, not only unassisted, but opposed by the greatest part of those states with whom we were then combined, was an attempt never to be justified by any comparative calculation of the populousness, the revenues, or the general strength of the two nations; it was a desperate struggle, which must finally end in our ruin. What, they asked, was the scene which we had chosen for this struggle? We have chosen Germany, they said; the very spot which, of all others, the French, if they had their choice, would have pointed out to us. That, by making Germany the theatre of war, they saw that country wasted and destroyed, the strength of which had always proved the greatest bulwark against their insatiable ambition: that they saw the swords of the Germans, through the whole extent of that vast and populous country, turned against each other; and they beheld with joy the English, whose interest it was to save them as much as possible, co-operating with their blood and treasures to complete the disunion, and consequently the desolation of Germany. That, in a war in that country, France has many advantages: she supports her armies, in a great degree, by pillaging those whom, in every respect, it is her interest to weaken: she is not very remote from her own frontiers, from whence she is easily provided, easily recruited; and by means of which a great part of the public money is expended in the country where it is raised. Is she unsuccessful? she is brought thereby but the nearer to her frontier, supports her troops with still the greater facility, and exhausts still less the natural wealth of her people: that even supposing the French army driven into France, these very advantages are considerably increased; and many obvious circumstances render it impossible for the allied army to push their success against France, on the side of Germany, to any decisive consequence. That to the English, on the contrary, every thing is unfavourable in such a war; their greatest successes will only carry them to a greater distance from their resources, and every step of their progress must make the transport of provision, artillery, ammunition, and the numerous and almost infinite necessities of a large army more difficult, and in the end altogether impracticable: that this was not vain speculation, the events which followed the battle of Crevelt, had sufficiently proved; prince Ferdinand, victorious in that action, was obliged, rather from the difficulty of subsisting than the superiority of the enemy, to repass the Rhine, and to bring back to Germany that war with which he had threatened France: that hence appeared the truth of that maxim, that victory itself could not save us, and that all our successes served only to accumulate new distresses, new difficulties, new charges; whilst France, who had only contracted her expences by the loss of her navy, encouraged us to enter deeper and deeper into the inextricable toils of a German war, in which we wasted our strength only to entangle ourselves further: that she held the strings, and could never be tired out at this sort of game; from whence arose an expence unknown, even in thought, to our forefathers, and which the single revenue of England was by no means able to bear: that our allies, if they deserved the name, supplied not the least part of this money; and the Hanoverians and Hessians contributed to our assistance only by enabling us to protract tract still longer our efforts in a system, in which nothing could so effectually serve us as the being defeated as early as possible: that, with regard to the king of Prussia, what we paid to that monarch might rather be considered as a tribute than a subsidy, since we received nothing in return; and that, far from being able to afford any relief to our armies, he was scarcely in a condition to support himself: that this alliance was still worse than the former, as it was an heavy charge, compensated not only with no real, but even with no shewy advantage: that indeed he was an ally the last in the world we ought to have chosen, on account of his long connection with our worst enemies, the mean and the hostile sentiments he has always entertained towards us, the injuries he has done us, and the general lightness of his faith with respect to his former allies: that we regard him, it is true, as the protector of the protestant religion; but how lightly he thinks of all religion, his writings testify; and what mischiefs he has done the protestant cause in particular, this war will be a lasting memorial: that when he entered Saxony, a protestant country, he found that religion no ways molested in those places, where it had been established or tolerated by the treaty of Westphalia; and even in the popish dominions, the persecution began to lose something of its edge, when he, under the name of its protector, brought upon it as great a calamity as its most inveterate enemies could have wished; by dividing the protestant states of the empire, and setting protestants to cut the throats of protestants, whilst all the papists were, at the same time, forced into a strict confederacy: that, had we kept ourselves clear of this ruinous system, and, instead of engaging France on her strong side, had attacked and vanquished her colonies, one after another, we might, without exhausting our own strength, have gradually taken away the principal resources of her trade; and whilst we continued this method, have had as little reason to grow tired of a war, the whole funds of which would be spent at home, as France had to grow weary of the present manner of waging it: that if the powers on the continent were allowed, without our interposition, to do their own business, they would probably better understand and better defend their own rights: that, at worst, let France enter, let her conquer, let her possess Hanover; there was no mischief she could do that country greater than it suffered by the present war; and we, not exhausting ourselves by a fruitless defence, should, in the end, by the entire possession of the French colonies, be able, besides the security of our just claims, to restore the Hanoverian dominions to their lawful sovereign, and even to procure some indemnification for the losses they might have sustained in our quarrel.

The friends of the German war, on the other hand, asserted, that the best reasons against our continental connections were more specious than solid; and that the chief writings on that side of the question, were rather declamations than arguments: that the complaint of the expence was, in some measure, just; but if the advantage was in any degree equivalent, the expence was incurred to good purpose: that France, by engaging so heartily as she had done in the German war, had diverted so much of her attention and her revenue from the navy, that it enabled us to give such a blow to her maritime strength, as possibly she might never be able to recover: that her engagement in the German war had likewise drawn her from the defence of her colonies, by which means we had conquered some of the most considerable she possessed: that it had withdrawn her from the protection of her trade, by which it was entirely destroyed, whilst that of England had never, in the profoundest peace, been in so flourishing a condition; so that, by embarking in this German war, France had suffered herself to be undone, so far as regarded her particular and immediate quarrel with England: but had she, they asked, obtained in Germany such successes as would counterbalance this loss? Far, very far from it: at that very moment she was infinitely less advanced than she was the year she entered Germany, after having spent such immense sums of money, and lost, by the sword, by disease, and by desertion, an hundred thousand of her people: that, on the other hand, the account stood not thus with regard to England; deeply embarked as she had been in this German war, in her particular quarrel with France, she had been carried along with an almost uninterrupted tide of success; she had taken many of the French colonies; she had destroyed their navy and their trade; and having insulted the enemy's coast, had ruined a harbour which might one day prove very alarming to England: that affairs in Germany were likewise in a very promising and agreeable situation; the French had been there frequently defeated; Hanover had been secured and protected; the king of Prussia had been preserved, so far at least, from the rage of his enemies; and, in general, the liberties of Germany had been hitherto secured: that thus, if we had incurred a great expence, we had done by it infinitely more than France had done at an expence infinitely greater than ours: that the advocates who declaimed against German connections, seemed to have forgot that the charge of the French army must exceed that of the English, in the same proportion as the number of their troops exceeded the difference between the French and the English pay: that those on the English establishment in Germany had, at no time, exceeded twenty-four thousand, and the rest of the confederates served very nearly on the same terms with the French; not to mention the subsidies, so greatly superior to ours, which that power paid to states from whom she had not a single regiment to augment her armies. Thus, although by our victories France was relieved from the charge of her navy, and that of defending some of her most considerable colonies, the German war alone had brought her forces to a distress of which the whole world had been witness; nor indeed could any less have happened; the expence, however, contracted, was still enormous; and trade, the resource of every war, was almost destroyed: that in England the expence was also undoubtedly great; but then, the old trade still remained to supply it, and new channels were opened: that, had we lain by and tamely beheld part of Germany possessed, and the rest compelled to receive laws from France, the war then would soon have been brought to an end; and that that people, strengthened by victory, by conquest, and alliance, would have been able to employ against us the whole force and whole revenue of their mighty monarchy: that it ought likewise to be considered, that common faith obliged us to adhere to our engagements both with Prussia and Hanover; and that the pleaded incapacity to assist them, arising from the greatness of the expence, could not excuse us, because the incapacity was not real; and if the expence was inconvenient, we ought to have attended to that circumstance, when we contracted our engagement: that it cannot be true that we received no advantage from our alliance with the king of Prussia; because, if it be once admitted that we entered with any reason into the German war, which they supposed undeniable, then the king of Prussia had been of very considerable service to us, inasmuch as it was his victory at Rosbach, and the reinforcement from his troops, which had enabled us to do all that we had since achieved: besides, if the support of the protestant religion were any part of our care, that religion must suffer severely by the ruin of the king of Prussia; for though the writings attributed to his Prussian majesty were such, as, if really his, reflected, on account of their impiety, great disgrace on his character as a man, yet as a king, in his public and political capacity, he is the natural protector of the protestant religion, and it will always be his interest to defend it.

Such were the sentiments of the two parties with regard to the nature of our German connections, when the parliament assembling in the month of November, the king repaired to the house of lords, and the commons assembling as usual, he declared from the throne the following speech to both houses:

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ The just concern which I have felt in my own breast, on the sudden death of the late king my royal grandfather, makes me not doubt but you must all have been deeply affected with so severe a loss. The present critical and difficult conjuncture has made this loss the more sensible, as he was the great support of that system, by which alone the liberties of Europe, and the weight and influence of these kingdoms can be preserved, and give life to measures conducive to those important ends.

“ I need not tell you the addition of weight which immediately falls upon me, in being called to the government of this free and powerful country at such a time, and under such circumstances. My consolation is in the uprightness of my own intentions, your faithful and united assistance, and the blessing of heaven upon our joint endeavours, which I devoutly implore.

“ Born and educated in this country, I glory in the name of Briton; and the peculiar happiness of my life will ever consist in promoting the welfare of a people, whose loyalty and warm affection to me I consider as the greatest and most permanent security of my throne; and I doubt not but their steadiness in those principles will equal the firmness of my invariable resolutions to adhere to and strengthen this excellent constitution in church and state, and to maintain the toleration inviolable. The civil and the religious rights of my loving subjects are equally dear to me with the most valuable prerogatives of my crown; and, as the surest foundation of the whole, and the best means to draw down the divine favour on my reign, it is my fixed purpose to countenance and encourage the practice of true religion and virtue.

“ I reflect with pleasure on the successes with which the British arms have been prospered this last summer. The total reduction of the vast province of Canada, with the city of Montreal, is of the most interesting consequence, and must be as heavy a blow to my enemies, as it is a conquest glorious to us; the more glorious, because effected without effusion of blood, and with that humanity which makes an amiable part of the character of this nation.

“ Our advantages gained in the East Indies have been signal, and must greatly diminish the strength and trade of France in those parts, as well as procure the most solid benefits to the commerce and wealth of my subjects.

“ In Germany, where the whole French force has been employed, the combined army, under the wise and able conduct of my general prince Ferdinand of Brunswic, has not only stopt their progress, but has gained advantages over them, notwithstanding their boasted superiority, and their not having hitherto come to a general engagement.

“ My good brother and ally the king of Prussia, although surrounded with numerous armies of enemies, has, with a magnanimity and perseverance almost beyond example, not only withstood their various attacks, but has obtained very considerable victories over them.

“ Of these events I shall say no more at this time, because the nature of the war in those parts has kept the campaign there still depending.

“ As my navy is the principal article of our naval strength, it gives me much satisfaction to receive it in such good condition; whilst the fleet of France is weakened to such a degree, that the small remains of it have continued blocked up by my ships in their own ports: at the same time, the French trade is reduced to the lowest ebb; and with joy of heart I see the commerce of my kingdoms, that great source of our riches, and fixed object of my never-failing care and protection, flourishing to an extent unknown in any former war.

“ The valour and intrepidity of my officers and forces, both at sea and land, have been distinguished so much to the glory of this nation, that I should be wanting in justice to them if I did not acknowledge it. This is a merit which I shall constantly encourage and reward; and I take this occasion to declare, that the zealous and useful service of the militia, in the present arduous conjuncture, is very acceptable to me.

“ In this state I have found things at my accession to the throne of my ancestors: happy in viewing the prosperous part of it; happier still should I have been, had I found my kingdoms, whose true interest I have entirely at heart, in full peace: but since the ambition, injurious encroachments, and dangerous designs of my enemies, rendered the war both just and necessary, and the generous overture made last winter towards a congress for a pacification, has not yet produced any suitable return, I am determined, with your cheerful and powerful powerful assistance, to prosecute this war with vigour, in order to that desirable object, a safe and honourable peace. For this purpose, it is absolutely incumbent upon us to be early prepared; and I rely upon your zeal and hearty concurrence to support the king of Prussia, and the rest of my allies, and to make ample provision for carrying on the war, as the only means to bring our enemies to equitable terms of accommodation."

" Gentlemen of the house of commons,

" The greatest uneasiness which I feel at this time, is in considering the uncommon burthens necessarily brought upon my faithful subjects. I desire only such supplies as shall be requisite to prosecute the war with advantage; be adequate to the necessary services; and that they may be provided for in the most sure and effectual manner. You may depend upon the faithful and punctual application of what shall be granted. I have ordered the proper estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before you; and also an account of the extraordinary expences which, from the nature of the different and remote operations, have been unavoidably incurred.

" It is with peculiar reluctance that I am obliged to mention any thing which personally regards myself. But as the grant of the greatest part of the civil list revenues is now determined, I trust in your duty and affection to me, to make the proper provision for supporting my civil government with honour and dignity. On my part, you may be assured of a regular and becoming œconomy.

" My lords and gentlemen,

" The eyes of all Europe upon you. From your resolutions the protestant interest hopes for protection, as well as all our friends for the preservation of their independency; and our enemies fear the final disappointment of their ambitious and destructive views. Let these hopes and fears be confirmed and augmented by the vigour and dispatch of our proceedings.

" In this expectation I am the more encouraged by a pleasing circumstance, which I look upon as one of the most auspicious omens of my reign: that happy extinction of divisions, and that union and good harmony which continue to prevail amongst my subjects, afford me the most agreeable prospect. The natural disposition and wish of my heart are to cement and promote them; and I promise myself that nothing will arise on your part to interrupt or disturb a situation so essential to the true and lasting felicity of this great people."

In answer to this sensible speech, the two houses presented addressees, filled with expressions of the strongest veneration and attachment. As the substance of both was similar, or rather the same, it will be sufficient to insert that of the commons, which was conceived in the following strain:

" Most gracious sovereign,

which your majesty and these kingdoms have sustained by the death of your majesty's royal grandfather, our late most excellent sovereign; the memory of whose just and prosperous reign will be held in reverence by latest posterity.

" We beg leave to congratulate your majesty on your happy accession to the throne, the only consideration that can alleviate our grief for such a loss. The knowledge of your majesty's royal virtues, wisdom, and firmness, opens to your faithful subjects the fairest prospect for their future happiness at home, and for the continuance of that weight and influence of your majesty's crown abroad, so essentially necessary, in this arduous and critical conjuncture, for the preservation of that system upon which the liberties of Europe depend.

" We return your majesty our humble thanks for your most gracious speech from the throne; and acknowledge, with the liveliest sentiments of duty, gratitude, and exultation of mind, those most affecting and animating words of our sovereign, That, born and educated in this country, he glories in the name of Briton. And we offer to your majesty the full tribute of our hearts, for the warm and tender expressions of your truly royal and tender affection towards your people. We venerate and confide in those sacred assurances of your majesty's firm and invariable resolution to adhere to and strengthen this excellent constitution in church and state; to maintain the toleration inviolate; and to protect your faithful subjects in that greatest of human blessings, the secure enjoyment of their religious and civil liberties.

" Permit us to congratulate your majesty on the various successes which, under the protection of God, have attended the British arms during the last summer, particularly in the reduction of Montreal, and the entire province of Canada; a conquest equally important and glorious, achieved with intrepidity and closed with humanity, the genuine attributes of that British spirit, which, under the benign auspices of your majesty, will, we trust, continue, by the Divine assistance, to give additional lustre to the arms of Great Britain.

" This valuable and extensive acquisition, joined to the signal advantages gained in the East Indies; the flourishing state of our commerce; the respectable condition of your majesty's navy, by which the remains of the enemy's fleet continue blocked up in their harbours, whilst their trade is almost annihilated; are considerations which fill our hearts with the most pleasing hopes, that your majesty will be thereby enabled to prosecute this just and necessary war, to that great and desirable object of establishing, in conjunction with your allies, a safe, honourable, and lasting peace.

" We see, with the greatest pleasure, that the progress of the French arms in Germany, notwithstanding their superiority of numbers, has been stopped, and, to the honour of your majesty's arms, their attempts hitherto baffled, by the wise and able conduct of his serene highness prince Ferdinand of Brunswick.

" When we consider the stupendous efforts made in every campaign by your majesty's great ally the king of Prussia, the defeat of the Austrians in Silesia, and that recent and glorious victory obtained over the army commanded by marshal Daun, we cannot sufficiently admire the invincible constancy constancy of mind, and inexhaustible resources of genius, displayed by that magnanimous monarch, to whom the most dangerous, and difficult situations have only administered fresh occasions for glory.

“ Our most dutiful acknowledgements are due to your majesty for the mention you have so graciously made of the distinguished valour and intrepidity of your officers and forces at sea and land, and for the declaration of your majesty’s constant resolution to encourage and reward such merit; and we return our most humble thanks to your majesty for your favourable acceptance of the zealous and useful service of the militia, in the present arduous conjuncture.

“ We assure your majesty, that your faithful commons, thoroughly sensible of this important crisis, and desirous, with the divine assistance, to render your majesty’s reign successful and glorious in war, happy and honourable in peace (the natural return of a grateful people to a gracious and affectionate sovereign) will concur in such measures as shall be requisite for the vigorous and effectual prosecution of the war; and that we will cheerfully and speedily grant such supplies as shall be found necessary for that purpose, and for the support of the king of Prussia, and the rest of your majesty’s allies: firmly relying on your majesty’s wisdom, goodness, and justice, that they will be applied in such a manner as will most effectually answer the ends for which they are granted, and with the utmost œconomy that the nature of such great and extensive operations will allow; and that we will make such an adequate provision for your majesty’s civil government as may be sufficient to maintain the honour and dignity of your crown with all proper and becoming lustre.

“ Your majesty’s faithful commons approach your royal person with hearts penetrated by the warmest and liveliest sense of your unbounded tenderness and concern for the welfare of your people; and rejoicing at the high satisfaction your majesty takes in the union which so universally prevails throughout your kingdoms: a deep sense of that national strength and prosperity visibly derived from this salutary source, and above all, your majesty’s approbation of that happy union, and the natural disposition and wish of your royal heart, to cement and promote it; are the strongest incentives to concord, and the surest pledge of its duration. The fixed resolution, which your majesty has declared, to countenance and encourage the practice of true religion and virtue, will, we doubt not, prove the best means of drawing down the favour of God upon a dutiful and united nation: and we shall never cease devoutly to offer up our ardent vows to the Divine Providence, that, as a recompence for these royal virtues, your majesty may reign in the hearts of a free and happy people; and that they, excited by your majesty’s benevolent care to discharge your royal function, and animated by gratitude for the enjoyment of so many blessings, may make the due return, by a constant obedience to your laws, and by the most steady attachment and loyalty to your person and government.”

The commons, not satisfied with these assurances of their loyalty and affection, agreed to a second address of thanks for the gracious manner in which the first had been received by his majesty. Even before they had established the orders and resolutions renewed at the beginning of every session, they proceeded to take this speech into consideration. A motion being made that a supply should be granted to his majesty, the house resolved itself into a committee, agreed to the motion, and immediately appointed the committee of supply, which was continued to the sixth day of March. It was in pursuance of these resolutions, that the house of commons granted for the support of his majesty’s household, and of the honour and dignity of the crown, during his life, such a revenue as, together with the annuities payable by virtue of any acts of parliament made in the reign of the late king, out of the hereditary civil list revenues, should amount to the clear yearly sum of eight hundred thousand pounds, to commence from the demise of his late majesty; to be charged upon, and made payable out of the aggregate fund. At the same time they resolved, that the several revenues payable to his late majesty, during his life, which continued to the time of his demise (other than such payments as were charged upon, and issuing out of the aggregate fund) should be granted and continued from the time of the said demise, to his present majesty during his life; and the produce of the said revenues, together with the produce of the hereditary revenues, which were settled, or appointed, towards the support of the late king’s household, should be, during the said term, added to, and consolidated with the aggregate fund.

The commons next proceeded to grant the supplies for the service of the ensuing year; the sum total of which amounted to nineteen millions six hundred sixteen thousand one hundred and nineteen pounds nineteen shillings ninepence three farthings: a sum, which, however, large, and even seemingly enormous, yet whoever considers the extensive nature of our military operations in almost every quarter, will allow, perhaps, to be no more than was absolutely necessary.

This great supply was raised by a continuation of the land and malt taxes, which constituted the standing revenue of the nation, and by borrowing the sum of twelve millions, the interest to be paid by an additional duty on beer and ale: by a continuation of the duties of ten shillings per ton upon all wines, vinegar, cyder, and beer, imported into Great-Britain, formerly granted by act of parliament for defraying the charges of the mint: by loans or exchequer-bills for one million five hundred thousand pounds, to be charged on the first aids to be granted in the next session of parliament: by a sum remaining in the Receipt of the Exchequer, being part of ninety thousand pounds granted to the late king in the year 1759, upon account, towards defraying the charge of the militia: by issuing one million seven hundred sixty-two thousand four hundred pounds from the sinking fund. The whole of the provisions made in this session fell very little short of twenty millions sterling; the surplus being intended to supply the deficiencies that might happen in any of the funds that had been established.

In the beginning of the session, before the committee had taken the civil list into consideration, the king sent a message by the chancellor of the Exchequer, informing the house of commons, that, being ever ready and desirous to give the most substantial proofs of his tender regard to the welfare of his people, he was willing, that, whenever the house should make provision for the support of his household, and of the honour and dignity of the crown, such disposition might be made of his majesty's interest in the hereditary revenues of the crown, as might best conduce to the utility and satisfaction of the public. In consequence of this intimation, the house deliberated on the matter, and the king willingly accepted a certain provision of eight hundred thousand pounds per annum, settled by act of parliament, in lieu of the former funds appropriated for the civil list revenue; and this consent was undoubtedly a royal instance of moderation, considering that this annuity was charged with fifty thousand pounds a year to his mother the princess dowager of Wales, fifteen thousand pounds per annum to the duke of Cumberland, and twelve thousand to the princess Amelia. After these deductions, his majesty received no more than seven hundred and twenty-three thousand pounds annually, for the support of his public state, the subsistence of all his brothers and sisters, and the maintenance of his royal and increasing family.

The bills founded on the resolutions of the committee of ways and means were regularly introduced, and passed into laws, according to the usual form, without any opposition or debate: for the whole house seemed to be actuated by the same spirit of loyalty and affection. The navy bill and the mutiny bill underwent the annual discussion, as usual; and the provisions in this last, relating to the trial and punishment for mutiny and desertion of officers and soldiers in the service of the East-India company, were by a new bill extended to the company's settlement of Fort Marlborough, and to such other principal settlements, wherein the company might be hereafter empowered to hold courts of judicature.

As the accession of a new king to the throne of Great-Britain has been generally distinguished by acts of grace in favour of debtors and delinquents, petitions were now presented to the house of commons by persons confined for debt in the different gaols of London, the borough of Southwark, and other parts of the kingdom, describing their situation, and imploring relief from the legislature.

To the cries of these captives, the legislature lent a favourable ear; and a bill in their behalf was brought into the house of commons, which afterwards passed into an act for the relief of prisoners. It contained a very remarkable clause, importing, that as many persons too often choose rather to continue in prison, and spend their substance there, than discover and deliver up to their creditors their estates or effects, towards satisfying their just debts; the creditors may compel any prisoner committed, or who shall hereafter be committed, and charged in execution, to appear at the quarter-sessions, with the copy of his detainer, and deliver, upon oath, a just schedule of his estate: that a prisoner, subscribing the schedule, and making a discovery of his estate, shall be discharged at the general or quarter sessions, under this act: and that on his refusal so to do, or concealing to the amount of twenty pounds, he shall suffer as a felon.

This compulsive clause was attended with a consequence, which, in all probability, the legislature did not foresee. Great numbers of tradesmen, and people in the lower classes of life, and even many who had moved in a higher sphere, were said to have laid hold on this opportunity of disencumbering themselves from their debts, which might have been honestly paid by a proper exertion of industry and temperance. Every person desirous of reaping the benefit of the act, prevailed upon some relation or friend to perform the part of compelling creditor. The public complained that the gaols about London were crowded with a succession of these voluntary captives; and that a great number of honest men were ruined by this indulgence shewn to their debtors by the clemency of parliament.

Certain it is, the common council of the city of London, in their instructions to the representatives in the new parliament, recommended to them to exert their utmost endeavours to procure the repeal of this compulsive clause, as a manifest grievance to the public.

In the month of January the king sent a message to the commons, importing, that his majesty being sensible of the zeal and vigour with which his faithful subjects in North America had exerted themselves, in defence of his just rights and possessions, recommended it to the house to take their services into consideration, and enable his majesty to give them a proper recompence for the expence incurred by the respective provinces in levying, cloathing, and maintaining the troops they had raised, according as the active vigour, and strenuous efforts of the respective provinces should appear to merit. This intimation was referred to the committee of supply, and that resolution taken in favour of the American provinces which we have mentioned before among the grants of the year. The royal message was likewise procured in favour of the East-India company, for enabling them to defray the expence of a military force in India; and they were accordingly gratified with the sum already specified under that article.

In the beginning of March the king made a proposal for securing the independency of the judges, which could not fail to inspire the subject with the most favourable opinion of his royal candour and moderation. In a speech from the throne he informed both houses of parliament, that, upon granting new commissions to the judges, the present state of their offices fell naturally under consideration: that, notwithstanding the act passed in the reign of king William III. for settling the succession to the crown, by which act the commissions of the judges were continued in force during their good behaviour, yet their offices had determined at the demise of the crown, or in six months after that event, as often as it had happened: that as he looked upon the independency and uprightness of the judges as essential to the impartial administration of justice, one of the best securities to the rights and liberties of his subjects, as well as conducive to the honour of the crown, he recommended this interesting object to the consideration of parliament, in order that such further provision might be made for securing the judges in the enjoyment of their offices during their good behaviour, notwithstanding any such demise, as should be be most expedient: that he hoped the commons would enable him to grant, and establish upon the judges, such salaries as he should think proper, so as to be absolutely secured to them during the continuance of their commissions: and that he could not let slip the present opportunity of thanking both houses for the great unanimity and application with which they had hitherto carried on the public business; exhorting them to proceed with the same good disposition, and with such dispatch, that this session might be brought to a happy conclusion.

This speech was received with that universal applause, which it so well deserved. The commons unanimously resolved to display their gratitude in an address to the throne. They acknowledged the most lively sense of his majesty's attention to an object so interesting to his people. They assured him, that his faithful commons saw, with joy and veneration, the warm regard and concern which animated his royal breast for the security of the religion, laws, liberties, and properties of his subjects: that the house would immediately proceed upon the important work recommended by his majesty with such tender care of his people; and would enable him to establish the salaries of the judges in such a permanent manner, that they might be enjoyed during the continuance of their commissions. They forthwith began to deliberate upon this subject; and their resolutions terminated in a law, enacting, among other particulars, That such part of the salaries of the judges as was before payable out of the yearly sums granted for the support of the king's household, and of the honour and dignity of the crown, should, after the demise of his present majesty, be charged upon, and payable out of all or any such duties or revenues, granted for the use of the civil government, as should subsist after the demise of his majesty, or of any of his heirs and successors. Thus the individuals, intrusted with the administration of the laws, were effectually emancipated from the power of the prerogative, and of all undue influence.

It was likewise in the beginning of March that the chancellor of the Exchequer communicated a message from the king to the commons, desiring the house would enable him to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred, or to be incurred, for the service of the year 1761. This message was immediately referred to the consideration of the committee of supply; and his majesty was indulged with one million, upon account, as we have already mentioned.

Mr. Onslow, who had so long filled the speaker's chair with equal candour and capacity, having signified his intention to retire from business, in consequence of age, infirmities, and other motives of a private nature, the commons determined to bestow upon him some signal marks of their esteem and regard. They accordingly resolved, that the thanks of the house should be given to Mr. Speaker, for his constant and unwearied attendance in the chair, during the course of above thirty-three years, in five successive parliaments; for the unshaken integrity and steady impartiality of his conduct there; and for the indefatigable pains he had, with uncommon abilities, constantly taken to promote the honour and dignity of parliament, and to preserve inviolable, the rights and privileges of the commons of Great-Britain.

The house also resolved to present an address to the king, humbly to beseech his majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to confer some signal mark of his royal favour upon the right honourable Arthur Onslow, esq; for his great and eminent services performed to his country, for the space of thirty-three years and upwards. This application was very agreeable to the king's own generous disposition. He expressed a proper sense of the speaker's great services, and unblemished character; and that gentleman was gratified with an annual pension of three thousand pounds, payable out of his majesty's treasure at the Exchequer, for his own life and that of his son. All the public business being dispatched, and all the bills having received the royal sanction, the king repaired to the house of lords on the nineteenth day of March, and closed the session with a speech from the throne.

Before I proceed to relate the operations of war during this year in the different climates of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, I think it necessary to observe, that the accession of his present majesty produced no alteration in the system of public affairs, and was attended with no revolution of any consequence, either in the church, the state, or the army. The metropolitan see of Canterbury was still possessed by Secker, alike distinguished for his piety and learning. The office of lord high chancellor was conferred upon lord Henly, baron Grange, who had given manifold proofs of his independent spirit, knowledge, and integrity. Lord Mansfield maintained his seat on the King's Bench, and judge Willes in the Common Pleas. The ministry and cabinet council underwent no material alteration, except in the accession of the earl of Bute, who succeeded the earl of Holderness as secretary of state for the northern department, and was supposed to stand with Mr. Pitt, the other secretary, as joint pilot at the helm of administration. The duke of Newcastle still directed the treasury; earl Granville presided at the council; and lord Anson at the board of Admiralty. Earl Temple kept the privy seal; and Mr. Legge acted as chancellor of the Exchequer, though in a little time he was dismissed from that employment. Mr. Charles Townshend being appointed secretary at war, soon proved by his conduct the fallacy of that maxim which holds genius inconsistent with industry; and performed every part of this office with such accuracy and expedition, as had never before appeared in that scene of transaction. The lucrative post of paymaster remained with Mr. Henry Fox, who, though not very acceptable to either party, had, by mere superiority of parts, been able to maintain his footing with both.

The management of the king's household devolved upon noblemen of unblemished characters. The chamberlain's wand was delivered to the duke of Devonshire, universally beloved for his generosity, and sweetness of disposition. The duke of Rutland, so distinguished for his benevolence, was created master of the horse; and the office of lord steward was bestowed upon earl Talbot, who, with equal spirit and perseverance, reformed many enormous abuses in the œconomy of the king's household. The earl of Halifax was nominated lord lieutenant of Ireland. Divers young noblemen were appointed lords of the king's bed-chamber†; and a very few alterations made in places of trust and profit; but, in general, all the members of the great offices, and all the commissioners of the revenue throughout the three kingdoms, were continued in their respective employments.

The chief command of the army in Great Britain was enjoyed by the lord viscount Ligonier. The German army in Westphalia, paid by England, remained under the auspices of prince Ferdinand of Brunswic; the marquis of Granby commanded the British forces on that service; and the direction of the troops in America was still intrusted to Sir Jeffery Amherst. Neither was any material change produced in the disposition of the different squadrons which composed the navy of Great Britain. Admiral Holborn's flag continued flying at Spithead. Sir Edward Hawke and Sir Charles Hardy were stationed in the bay of Quiberon. Sir Charles Saunders kept the sea in the Mediterranean. The rear-admirals Stevens and Cornish commanded one squadron in the East-Indies; rear-admiral Holmes another at Jamaica; Sir James Douglas a third at the Leeward Islands; lord Colvil a fourth at Halifax in Nova Scotia. These were stationary; but other squadrons were equipped occasionally, under different commanders; besides the single ships that cruized in and about the Channel, and those that were stationed to protect the trade of Great-Britain in different parts of the world.

But let us now turn our eyes to the continent of Europe. The events of the last campaign had produced no material alteration in the political system of its different princes and states. Those that professed a neutrality, still kept aloof, and enjoyed the fruits of their forbearance. The Dutch continued to trade, and grumble at the interruption which their navigation sustained from the English cruisers: nay, the states of Holland and West Friesland resolved, in consequence of the proceedings of the English, that twelve ships of the line should be equipped with all expedition, and employed in cruising in the Mediterranean for the protection of their commerce. The Danes extended their trade in silence. The Spaniards at last began to feel the benefit of an active traffic. The Portuguese monarch was wholly engaged in the trial and expulsion of jesuits and conspirators. The court of Vienna seemed more and more determined upon prosecuting the war with vigour. The empress of Russia promised to act in perfect concert with her allies: the Swedes appeared still irresolute. As for the French monarch, whatever ambition or interest he might have to achieve conquests, or to retrieve what he had lost in the course of the war, his finances were so encumbered, that he could no longer furnish the subsidies which he had promised to the allies of his crown; and therefore professed an earnest desire to put an end to the troubles which had so long desolated the best part of Europe.

In the month of February his ambassador at the court of Stockholm delivered a declaration to the Swedish monarch, importing, that the most Christian king, moved by the calamities of war, so widely diffused, and so severely felt in different parts of the world, thought it his indispensable duty to declare, that his humanity in general, and his regard to his own subjects in particular, prompted him to express his desire that his allies would concur with him in restoring the peace of Europe: that in adjusting the differences between France and England, he would abundantly display his moderation, whenever Great Britain should be inclined to acquiesce in reasonable terms: that common humanity required his allies to concert with him a plan of pacification, and he hoped every member of the alliance would labour to strengthen, if possible, the bands of amity with which they were connected: that, in the mean time, an accumulation of distress among his unhappy subjects, an additional depopulation of countries, a disorder in the finances of several powers, and the greatest doubt whether an advantageous peace could be made in Germany, induced him to declare, that as the war had considerably diminished his resources, he was constrained to lessen his subsidies, and even to give notice, that, should the war continue, he could no longer promise an exact compliance with the letter of his engagements.

France was not only exhausted by external wars, but likewise embroiled with internal dissensions. The disputes between the clergy, and the civil administration of justice, far from being quieted by the royal authority, seemed to acquire fresh rancour from some late complaints exhibited against the Jesuits; a society which at this juncture incurred universal odium, from the intrigues and conspiracy which some of their members had conducted in the kingdom of Portugal. They were extremely unpopular in France, not only on account of the doctrines which they taught and promulgated in their seminaries and writings, but also for their officious interfering in temporal concerns; and particularly for some frauds in commerce, of which they were loudly and universally accused. They had prosecuted a considerable traffic with the island of Martinique; and some of their vessels being taken by the English cruisers, seized this pretence for stopping payment, in order to defraud their creditors: but they were cited before the tribunals of the kingdom, and compelled to do justice to those whom they had intended to injure. The issue of this prosecution was attended with new disgrace to the whole order, and the people in general wished for their expulsion from France. The parliament of Paris of Boston in the county of Lincoln. Mary countess of Bute was vested with the title of baroness Mountstuart, of Wortley in the county of York; the title of baron to devolve to her lawful issue male by John earl of Bute.

Archibald duke of Argyle dying in April, the title and estate devolved on his cousin lieutenant general John Campbell. The marquis of Tweedale was constituted justice general of Scotland, in the room of the deceased duke; whose post of keeper of the seal for Scotland was given to Charles duke of Queensberry.

took cognizance of their books, some of which they condemned to the flames, as containing doctrines subversive of all government and morality. They moreover issued some severe edicts against the society; but the king interposing in their behalf, published an arret, suspending all proceedings against them for a twelvemonth. This the parliament consented to register, on condition that it should continue in force no longer than the first of April; at the same time they directed the first president to represent in the strongest terms to his majesty, the ill consequences of protecting such a pernicious order; the more dangerous from their great number, which in France alone was computed to amount to above twenty thousand.

The war still continued to rage with unabated fury in Germany. In the beginning of January, while both armies remained in winter-quarters, the head-quarters of prince Ferdinand being at Uslar, and those of the French general in Hesse Cassel, divers hot skirmishes happened in different parts of Westphalia. General Luckner, with four thousand men of the allied army, had in December been driven from Heligenstadt by a more numerous body of French under the command of the count de Broglie. In the beginning of January the same count, reinforced by Mr. de Stainville, constrained general Mansberg to abandon the town of Duderstadt, where he was posted; but a reinforcement arriving under Kilmansegge and Luckner, the French were expelled in their turn, and pursued with considerable loss as far as Witzenhausen.

Prince Ferdinand having assembled his army in the beginning of February, began his march towards Cassel on the eleventh day of the month, in four columns, by the way of Warbourg, Liebenau, Sielen, and Dringelbourg, the command of the vanguard being assigned to the marquis of Granby, who advanced to Kerchberg and Metze. In the mean time, the hereditary prince having received intelligence that the French garrison of Fritzlar was not prepared for a defence, he marched thither with a few battalions, in hope of carrying the place by a sudden assault with musquetry only: but he met with such a warm reception, that he was obliged to wait for the arrival of cannon and mortars, which were plied with great vivacity; and the garrison being destitute of artillery, colonel de Narbonnes, their commander, capitulated on honourable terms, after having made a very gallant resistance. During these transactions, lieutenant-general Briedenbach took possession of a large magazine at Rosenthal, and made an unsuccessful attempt upon Marburg, in which he lost his life; but this place was afterwards relinquished by the French at the approach of the marquis of Granby, who took possession of it without opposition. Gundersberg likewise surrendered to the same general.

General Sporcken, with the united corps of Kilmansegge and Wangenheim, had advanced by the way of Dargelstadt to Thomas-spruck, upon the Unstrut. There being reinforced by a body of Prussians, he fell upon the Saxon troops, cantoned between Mulhausen and Eysenach, with such vigour and success, that a great number were killed, and five entire battalions made prisoners of war. On the other hand, the enemy attacked the post of Gentzungen, near Filtzberg, from whence they were repulsed with considerable loss. The design of prince Ferdinand was to reduce Ziegenhayn and Cassel, before the Duc de Broglie should receive his reinforcements; and these two places were accordingly invested.

The allied army was cantoned in two lines, with the right extending to the Lahne, and the left stretched towards Fulda; while prince Ferdinand fixed his quarters at Schwienberg. Lord Granby, having left a garrison in Marburg, marched into the neighbourhood of Lohr. Another body, under general Hardenberg, advanced to Kircham; while the detachment employed at the siege of Cassel proceeded very slowly in their operations, and received some mortifying checks from vigorous sallies that were made by the garrison. At length the Duc de Broglie, being joined by all the detachments he expected from the Lower Rhine, advanced towards the army of the allies, which at this time was in no condition to cope with him in the field. On the twenty-first day of March the detachment under the hereditary prince was, in its retreat from Heimbach, encountered by a numerous body of the enemy, near the village of Stangerode, in the neighbourhood of Grunberg. Baron Clofen, who commanded the French troops on this occasion, attacked nine regiments of Hanoverians, Hessians, and Brunswickers, at the head of his dragoons, with such impetuosity, just as they were entering a defile, that they were totally defeated with the loss of two thousand men, either killed or taken, eighteen pair of colours, and twelve pieces of artillery. Major-general de Rhede fell in the action, and the rest of the detachment retired in tolerable order.

After this disaster, the allies continued to retreat as the enemy advanced. They relinquished the siege of Ziegenhayn, from which they did not retire without considerable loss. All the places they had lately conquered were now deserted. The siege of Cassel was raised; the army took post behind the Dymel, and prince Ferdinand established his head quarters at Neuhas near Paderborn. In consequence of these motions, the French were again in possession of the whole landgraviate of Hesse-Cassel, masters of Gottingen and Munden in Hanover, and at liberty to penetrate into the heart of that electorate. The situation of the allies appeared the more dangerous, as the prince de Soubise was at the head of a second French army, encamped on the Lower Rhine; and if he had heartily co-operated with the marechal de Broglie, it is generally thought they might have terminated the war before the close of the summer.

Their progress, however, was retarded by the loss of a large magazine of hay, collected at Wesel on the Rhine, which was consumed by fire, not without suspicion that it was wilfully destroyed. The hereditary prince of Brunswick, at the head of a separate body, advanced to Nettelen, in the neighbourhood of Munster, about the middle of May, to watch the motions of the army under Soubise, who caused three different camps to be formed at Dusseldorf, Burich, and Rees, though part of his forces still continued in cantonment. The war was in the mean time prosecuted by detached parties, and skirmishes were fought with various success. The army of the duke de Broglie, having crossed the Dymel about the latter end of June, dislodged general Sporcken from his post on the left of that river, with the loss of eighteen hundred men taken prisoners, nineteen pieces of cannon, four hundred horses, and two hundred waggons. After this exploit, the French took possession of Warburg, Paderborn, and Dringebroen, and compelled prince Ferdinand to repass the Lippe on the second day of July. These successes, however, were over balanced by the achievements of small parties, which he detached from time to time to harass them in their motions, and cut off their convoys of provision. On the thirteenth day of July, in the morning, general Luckner, with his detachment, advanced to Salme, where the count de Chabot was posted with a strong body of horse and foot; which he attacked with such impetuosity, that they were constrained to repass the Lippe with precipitation, and lost about two hundred men, and as many horses, in their retreat. Other parties intercepted the French convoys in the neighbourhood of Cassel, and did such considerable damage to the enemy, that they resolved to unite their armies, and give battle to prince Ferdinand.

The allies were encamped at Hohenover: the right wing, at the extremity of which the hereditary prince was posted, extended as far as the village of Buderch, and this was guarded by a detachment. The body of the army occupied the heights of Wambeln; and the prince of Anhalt possessed the ground between Illingen and Hohenover. The marquis of Granby maintained his position on the heights of Kirch-Denckern: lieutenant-general Wutgenau, advancing from the heath of Untrup, marched by his right, in order to reach the village of Kirch-Denckern: the avenues and posts on the little rivers Aast and Sultzbah were defended by the piquets of the army. On the fifteenth day of July, in the evening, the army of Soubise, having struck their tents, advanced on the left of the allies, and dislodged the advanced posts of lord Granby, against whose corps their chief effort was directed. Prince Ferdinand now thought proper to make a new disposition. The marquis was commanded to maintain his ground to the last extremity. Wutgenau was ordered to make a motion to the left, to block up the high road from Lipstadt to Ham, and to act in concert with the marquis, whose right was moreover sustained by the left of the body commanded by the prince of Anhalt, and this general's own right extended to the Aast, above Kirch-Denkern. Lieutenant-general Conway replaced the prince of Anhalt, between Illingen and Hohenover. The hereditary prince ordered lieutenant-general Bose to secure the heights of Wambeln, leaving count Kilmansegge on the side of Buderich. The greatest part of the artillery was planted by count Schaumbourg Lippe on the front of the left. General Sporcken, who encamped with a separate body at Hortzfeld, was ordered to detach six squadrons, and as many battalions over the Lippe, to support M. de Wutgenau, and to co-operate with the rest as he should judge most effectual for the advantage of the whole. Lord Granby being furiously attacked by the enemy, sustained a prodigious fire of artillery and small arms, and with unshaken resolution, withstood all their efforts until the arrival of Wutgenau; who, advancing on his left, and charging them in flank, obliged them to retire into the woods with precipitation: then he extended his right to Haus-Vilinghausen, and turned his left towards the high road of Ham, the defence of which place was his chief object.

Prince Ferdinand having learned from the prisoners, that mareschal Broglie had decamped from Erwitte at break of day, in order to join Soubise, and give battle to the allies, concluded that the strongest efforts would be made upon his left, and took his precautions accordingly. He ordered general Howard to bring up the brigade of infantry commanded by lord Frederick Cavendish, and the cavalry of lord Pembroke. Colonel Grevendorff was detached with two battalions to barricade and fortify the village of Kirch-Denckern, and to be there supported, in case of necessity, by general Howard. Mean while, the enemy kept possession of some posts opposite to the picquets of the allied army, and the patrols skirmished all night. At three in the morning the whole French army advanced again to the attack on the side where Wutgenau was posted, and a dreadful fire of cannon and musquetry was maintained on both sides for five hours, during which the enemy was not able to gain one inch of ground. About nine, prince Ferdinand receiving information that their design was to cannonade the camp of lord Granby from an opposite eminence, immediately ordered a body of troops to anticipate this operation, by a vigorous charge. This movement proved decisive. The troops advanced with amazing intrepidity, and attacked with such vigour as in a little time obliged the enemy to give way, and abandon the field to the allies. Their left, which still maintained a severe cannonade on that side where the hereditary prince commanded, no sooner heard of the miscarriage on their right, than they desisted from the attack, and retreated in order. The left of the enemy was pursued as far as Hilstrup, about a league from the field of battle; but as the nature of the ground did not permit the cavalry to act, they sustained the less damage in their retreat. In this unsuccessful attack, they lost about five thousand men, killed or taken, with a few colours, and pieces of cannon; whereas the loss of the allies, in killed and prisoners, did not amount to above five hundred.

This action was the climax of the campaign of 1761 in Westphalia. It did the greatest honour to the wisdom of the accomplished commander in the disposition, and to the bravery of the troops in the combat; but it was far from being decisive: for, notwithstanding the loss of the French, they were still superior in their numbers. On this disaster the old misunderstanding between Soubise and Broglie broke out with fresh animosity. Narratives, memorials, and replies, conceived with great bitterness, were mutually remitted from both marshals to their court. Broglie alledged, that his misfortune was owing to the prince de Soubise's delay, who did not begin his attack till it was too late for him to continue it. The prince de Soubise, on the other hand, affirmed, that Broglie began his attack earlier than the time that had been fixed, in hopes of forcing the allies without Soubise's assistance; and when he found that point lost, obliged Soubise to retreat, that he might not have the honour of retrieving it.

Immediately

Immediately after the action, the two French armies separated, Broglie marched back towards Cassel; and Soubise, retreating to Dortmund, passed the Roer; as if they had laid aside for that campaign all thoughts of acting further on the offensive. But his passage of the Roer was designed to secure a great number of barges coming down the Rhine, loaded with forage for his army; and before he took this step, he sent off two large detachments to reinforce Broglie. Having received his forage, he repassed both the Roer and the Lippe, and advanced as far as Dulmen; while Broglie, penetrating further into the electorate of Hanover, took possession of Kester, which he fortified, and seemed determined to lay siege to the town of Hameln. Prince Ferdinand, being greatly inferior in number, retired to Dumolt, and called in most of his detachments. The French general encamped in his neighbourhood, on the heights of Neim, and many skirmishes happened; in one of which prince Henry, brother to the hereditary prince of Brunswick, was mortally wounded. About the middle of August an advantage was gained at Cassel by general Luckner, who attacked and routed a body of the enemy, from whom he took a considerable number of men and horses.

Mareschal Broglie having crossed the Weser with his whole army, as if he had intended to fall upon the city of Hanover, prince Ferdinand made a forced march, passed the Dymel, and advanced to Cassel. This movement obliged the French general to retire with the greater part of his army: then prince Ferdinand, proceeding to Paderborn, established his head-quarters at Buhne, from whence he extended his forces towards Hameln. Broglie once more passed the Weser, encamped near Eimbeck, and laid the whole country under contribution. In the mean time, Soubise having erected his ovens at Dorsten, and garrisoned the place with one battalion, the hereditary prince found means to attack and reduce the town, to make prisoners of the garrison, to destroy the ovens, and burn the magazines there provided: an exploit, in consequence of which the prince de Soubise retreated to the other side of the Lippe; but he soon repassed that river, and advanced again towards Caesfeld, from whence his detachments over-ran all the northern parts of Westphalia.

While prince Ferdinand lay encamped at Wilhelmstall in the neighbourhood of Hameln, and the hereditary prince, at the head of a detachment, scoured the open country of Hesse-Cassel, the mareschal Broglie made reprisals in the Hartz, where he reduced and dismantled the strong castle of Schutzfels, and made the garrison prisoners of war. A detachment, commanded by his brother the count de Broglie, and prince Xavier of Saxony, having made a forced march, took possession of Wolfenbuttel, and then laid siege to Brunswick; but before they could reduce the city, the hereditary prince being joined by general Luckner, flew to the relief of his father's capital. At his approach they relinquished their enterprise, and retired out of Wolfenbuttel with such precipitation as to leave some of their cannon behind, and about five hundred men, who were taken.

Towards the end of September, a detachment from the army of Soubise, commanded by the marquis de Conflans, advanced to the gates of Embsen, which was garrisoned by two companies of English invalids, who obtained an honourable capitulation, and embarked from Bremen: then the French troops laid the town under contribution, and evacuated the place; but the boors of the country rising in arms, and sinking the pontoons on which the enemy had passed the river, the French general sent a second detachment, which brought off the first, after having dispersed and hanged some of the peasants in terror. Another party from the army of Soubise entered the city of Osnabrug, which the soldiers were permitted to pillage, as the inhabitants could not pay the exorbitant contribution which was demanded. A third made an attempt upon Bremen; but the inhabitants joining the garrison, obliged the French to retreat with precipitation; and they were afterwards reinforced by two battalions of the British legion, the better to secure the magazines deposited in that place for the use of the allied army.

In the mean time Broglie lay inactive at Eimbeck, without attempting any thing of importance; nor was he at all disturbed in his position, until the beginning of November, when prince Ferdinand had concerted a plan for attacking him suddenly, before he could call in his detachments; or, at least, to intercept and cut off a large body of fifteen battalions posted at Eschershausen, under the command of Mons. de Chabot. For this purpose he ordered the hereditary prince and general Luckner, reinforced by the garrison of Wolfenbuttel, to advance from their respective posts, so as to be in the neighbourhood of Eimbeck, at a certain hour on the fifth of November. He commanded the marquis of Granby to force the French post at Cappelnhagen on the fourth; to proceed next day to Wickenfen, and block up a defile in that neighbourhood, on the road from Eschershausen to Eimbeck. He sent general Hardenberg with a detachment to pass the Weser at Badenwerder, that he might at the appointed time take possession of a defile at Amelunxhorn, on the other road from Eschershausen to Eimbeck.

Having taken the necessary precautions, he himself, with the main body of his army, crossed the Weser on the fourth near Hastenbeck, and advanced towards Eimbeck; but, when he approached Wickenfen, he found the road occupied by a strong body of British grenadiers and Highlanders: for the marquis of Granby had gallantly forced the enemy's post at Cappelnhagen, and blocked up the defile by the hour appointed. Chabot, perceiving himself intercepted, retreated immediately towards Eschershausen, and struck into the other road to Eimbeck, which general Hardenberg had been ordered to secure: but in his march to Badenwerder, some of his pontoons were overturned, and this accident retarded him so long, that he did not arrive at the place appointed until seven in the morning; and by that time Chabot had passed the defile in his way to Eimbeck, which he reached at noon, without further interruption. Thus the plan miscarried; and this must frequently be the fate of such schemes as depend upon a variety of incidents.

Prince Ferdinand, notwithstanding the disappointment, advanced toward the French camp, which he found too strong to be attacked with any prospect of success. Then he resolved to turn their their flanks, as if he designed to cut off their communication with Gottingen; a motion which, he knew, would either bring Broglie to an engagement on equal terms, or oblige him to retreat. The last part of the alternative he chose to embrace, and on the ninth retired with his whole army. This was the last transaction of any consequence that happened between the opposite armies in Westphalia. Broglie quartered his forces in Cassel, and that neighbourhood. The troops of Soubise were distributed at Dusseldorf, and along the Lower Rhine. The allies fixed their quarters at Hildersham, Munster, Hamelen, and Eimbeck. The British cavalry wintered in East Friesland, and the infantry in the bishopric of Osnabrug.

We have already observed, that the last campaign had ended more to the advantage of his Prussian majesty than the preceding one had done; for those two great victories of Lignitz and Torgau, with which he then closed his operations, had not only rescued his affairs in Silesia and Saxony from impending destruction, but had enlarged his field for recruiting, and prepared him, in all appearance, for more early and vigorous action, than could have been expected in any of the foregoing campaigns. But every one was surprised to observe, that this year he had altered the system of his conduct. An inactivity and languor was diffused over all his operations. He seemed to have adopted the caution and slowness, which had been so long opposed to his vivacity by M. Daun. The summer was almost wholly spent, and the king of Prussia had scarcely been mentioned. Whatever was the cause of this inactivity, whether it proceeded from the difficulty of providing forage, or from an opinion entertained by his Prussian majesty, that it was most for his interest to remain on the defensive, we shall not pretend to determine. Certain it is, he himself, with one part of his forces, continued quietly in a very strong camp in Upper Silesia, while his brother prince Henry, with the other, was no less securely posted under the walls of Leipzig, in the neighbourhood of count Daun the Austrian general.

While the main armies were thus disposed, their partizans exerted themselves, as usual, in bold and sudden incursions. In the beginning of April the Prussian majors-general Schenkendorff and Sybourg, advancing with a body of troops from Gera towards Neustadt on the Orla, continued their march to Saalfeld, where they attacked an Austrian detachment commanded by general Kleist, who was routed with considerable loss. They likewise dislodged a body of the army of the Empire from the village of Schwartz, which they had secured with two battalions, as a post of importance. In this expedition the Prussians took several pieces of cannon, colours, waggons loaded with baggage and ammunition, and above eleven hundred men, including two and thirty officers. After this exploit, the Prussian generals sent a detachment to attack the corps under general Guasco near Plaune in Voightland, who, after a sharp dispute, was forced to retire with the loss of four pieces of cannon, and all his baggage. Other petty advantages of the same kind were obtained in the beginning of summer by the Prussian detachments; but the king in person undertook nothing of consequence in the field.

In Pomerania the Swedes were not in motion till the month of August, when prince Henry, having received information that they had begun to advance towards the Prussian territories, detached general Stutterheim to join colonel Belling in that country with a few battalions, at whose approach the enemy retreated. It was in the beginning of the same month, that the army of the empire advancing in Saxony as if they designed to attack Leipzig, prince Henry sent general Seydlitz with a detachment of seven thousand men, who fell upon them with such impetuosity, that they were obliged to give way, and retreated with great precipitation to a considerable distance from the Prussian cantonments, which they never afterwards presumed to approach.

The Russian ministry, having been long sensible of the inconveniencies to which their operations were subject from their great distance from the scene of action, determined, if possible, to reduce Colberg, which would serve as a magazine and a key to Pomerania. With this view general Romanzoff was detached, in the month of July, with a considerable body of forces to invest that fortress by land, while it should be blocked up by sea by a strong squadron, in which an additional number of troops with the artillery and warlike stores were transported. This was joined by the Swedish fleet in August, and Romanzoff began to cannonade the place; but, as he did not open the trenches in a regular manner, as the town was strongly fortified and defended by a numerous garrison, under the command of an accomplished officer; as the Russians were little accustomed to sieges, and the season was very far advanced, the Prussian monarch hoped it would hold out until the frost should set in, and render the approaches of the enemy impracticable. The Swedes, at the same time, seemed to second the operations of their allies. Their army in western Pomerania, having received a reinforcement, began to advance again toward the Prussian territories, and skirmished with Stutterheim; but no enterprize of importance was undertaken on either side.

The main Russian army, commanded by Buterlin, could not take the field till the season was far advanced. In May, however, a detachment marched towards Silesia without artillery, and formed a camp at Bojanovo: another body established a considerable magazine at Posen; a third, under count Tottleben, entered Pomerania in the beginning of June, and made a furious attack upon Belgarde, from whence he was repulsed with considerable loss. After this miscarriage, he sent out detachments as far as the frontiers of the New Marche, where they took possession of Landsberg upon the Wartha. In the month of August, while the head-quarters of the Prussian monarch were at Strehlen, the Russian general Czernicheff advanced, with the vanguard of that army to Wohlau; and the Cossacks, with other light troops, passing the Oder, ravaged the country in the neighbourhood of Jauer. Another detachment, more powerful, penetrated into Silesia as far as Breslau, and began to cannonade that capital: but lieutenant-general Tawsein, who commanded the garrison, being reinforced by a body of troops under major-general Knoblock, marched out of the place, and attacked the enemy with such resolution, that they abandoned their batteries and decamped, after having suffered considerable damage.

At length general Butturlin advanced with the grand army of the Russians: and, notwithstanding all the vigilance and activity of the Prussian king, whose motions and measures for some time prevented their junction with the Austrian army under Laudohn, this was in the end effected; and now his affairs seemed altogether desperate. Yet, far from being abandoned by his wonted fortitude, he had recourse to expedients, which seem to have disappointed the designs of his enemies. He detached a considerable body of forces into Poland under the command of general Platen, whose motions were conducted with such secrecy and expedition, that he burned three Russian magazines in that kingdom, before the object of his march was known; and the great magazine at Posen narrowly escaped the same fate. Immediately after this achievement, general Butturlin separated the main body of his army from the Austrians, and retreated towards Poland: yet he left general Czernicheff with a considerable body of forces to act in concert with Laudohn, who, about this juncture, distinguished himself by an extraordinary exploit, which proved very detrimental to the Prussian monarch's affairs.

Schweidnitz, which had changed masters more than once in the course of this war, he considered as the most valuable place that remained to him in Silesia. It was central in its situation, strongly fortified, and contained a great magazine of military stores and artillery. Laudohn laid a plan for reducing it by surprise, and it was soon crowned with unexpected success. On the first day of October, at three in the morning, the troops allotted for this service advanced to the attack in four different places, and, under the favour of a thick fog, not only approached, but even fixed their scaling ladders, before they were discovered by the garrison, who scarce had time to fire a few cannon at the assailants. The contest, however, was maintained for some time with small arms, until a powder magazine in one of the outworks blew up, and about three hundred men on each side were destroyed by the explosion. The Austrians, taking advantage of the confusion produced by this accident, advanced to the body of the place, and bursting open the gates, entered the town without much opposition. At day-break they found themselves masters of the place; and the governor, lieutenant-general Zastrow, with all his garrison, amounting to three thousand men, were made prisoners. Thus Laudohn, at the expence of about six hundred men who fell in the attack, took above five times that number; and made himself master of a strong important fortress, in which he found a vast magazine of meal, and a numerous train of artillery. The king of Prussia could not but severely feel this stroke, which was equal to a defeat in the open field: but he bore his loss with fortitude, contenting himself with declaring, he would suspend his opinion of Zastrow's conduct, until he should be better informed of the particulars. In the mean time, this event obliged him to alter his position, and draw nearer to Breslau.

In the beginning of December he there cantoned his army, and the Austrian forces were quartered in the neighbourhood of Schweidnitz. Immediately before the king repaired to Breslau, he had the good fortune to discover a conspiracy, which was formed against his person by the baron de Warkotch, a man of considerable rank and fortune in Silesia, and one Francis Schmedt, a priest. Their intention was to seize the king when he should come forth unattended, and conduct him to the Austrian camp; a scheme, in which it is confidently affirmed, they were both encouraged and assisted by the court of Vienna. The discovery was made by one of the baron's domestics, who, being intrusted with a letter from the baron to the ecclesiastic, and suspecting the contents, delivered it to the Prussian monarch. Thus the mystery was unravelled: a detachment was immediately sent to apprehend the baron, and seize all his papers. Both were accordingly secured; but he afterwards found means to escape through a window. His lady was, however, detained in custody. Schmedt having likewise consulted his safety by flight, the king caused them to be cited to appear by the twenty-first day of January, to answer the charge brought against them, on pain of forfeiting their lives and estates.

In the month of November the mareschal count Daun, having received a large reinforcement from the army of Laudohn, formed a plan for attacking the strong camp of prince Henry of Prussia, in the neighbourhood of Meissen. An attempt was accordingly made, and some of the Prussian advanced posts were carried; but the enemy soon met with such a vigorous resistance, that their general thought proper to abandon the enterprize, and return to his camp. He then cantoned his forces, in the neighbourhood of Dresden, while the Imperial army was put into quarters at Naumburg and Zwickaw. These motions induced prince Henry to distribute his troops also in quarters of cantonment, extending on the right, to Meissen, and on the left, to Katzenhausen.

The great Russian army retreated beyond the Vistula; but the corps under Romanzoff still continued before Colberg, notwithstanding all the efforts of the prince of Wurtemberg, whom the king of Prussia had sent to head his forces in Pomerania. The blockade had for some time been turned into a regular siege; and colonel Heyde who commanded the garrison, made a very obstinate defence. In the beginning of October, the boisterous weather obliged the Swedish squadron to retire. A Russian ship of the line was wrecked, and all the crew perished: their hospital ship was accidentally set on fire and destroyed: in a word, the Russian fleet likewise withdrew, and returned to Cronstadt; and then the garrison of Colberg received a large supply of provision from Stetin. These circumstances concurring with the severity of the season, it was thought would compel even the Russians to quit the field, and at any rate render the prosecution of the siege impracticable; but Romanzoff seemed to set the winter at defiance, and carried on his operations with unremitting vigour, until he made himself master of a small fort that commanded the harbour. By means of this acquisition he cut off the garrison of Colberg from all communication by sea; so that they were in danger of perishing by famine, when colonel Heyde surrendered, on the seventeenth day of December. This important conquest enabled the the Russian ministry to supply and reinforce their armies in Germany by sea. It likewise secured to them all the eastern part of Pomerania, where accordingly Romanzoff's forces were distributed for the winter; his own head-quarters being established at Stargat, about twenty miles from Stetin.

Before we conclude the foreign transactions of this year, it may not be improper to take notice of an accident, that fully demonstrates the extreme regard, which the Christian powers pay to the Ottoman Porte. In the course of the preceding year, a large Turkish ship of the line, called the Ottoman Crown, was seized by the Christian slaves on board, who rose upon the Turks, and, having overpowered them, brought the ship into Malta; where, according to custom, the prize was divided among the captors. The Porte demanded the restitution of the ship in the most insolent terms; and the knights of Malta, who are at perpetual war with the infidels, treated this demand with contempt. The grand signior, incensed at the refusal, sent a public manifesto to Naples by the capuchins of Tunis, in which he bitterly complained of the Maltese knights, and threatened their total extirpation; at the same time he began to equip a formidable fleet of ships and galleys: but as he caused large quantities of warlike stores to be transported by the Black Sea to the mouth of the Danube, and a rumour prevailed that he had lately concluded a treaty of alliance with the Prussian monarch, certain powers suspected that he harboured some other design, under the pretext of an armament against Malta. The empress queen of Hungary, to avoid any occasion of giving umbrage to the grand signior, forbade all the knights of Malta residing in her dominions, to repair to the defence of that island, in case it should be attacked: a circumstance that plainly evinces the extreme awe, in which the court of Vienna stood of the Ottoman Porte. The French king acted with no less caution and still more delicacy and prudence. He purchased the Turkish ship which had been taken, and sent it to Constantinople as a present to the sultan. It was protected in the voyage by the British cruisers; and the grand signior was pleased to signify that he was fully satisfied.

Let us return now to the prosecution of the war at home.

Even from the beginning of winter, the single ships that cruised in the Channel were conducted with such prudence and circumspection, that they made prize of a great number of French privateers; a circumstance that demonstrated their own vigilance and the enemy's activity. In the month of January captain Elphinston, commander of the Richmond, mounted with thirty two guns, fell in with the Felicité, a French frigate, of the same force, off the coast of Holland; and a severe engagement began about ten in the morning, near S' Gravesande, about eight miles from the Hague, to which place the prince of Orange, general York the British envoy, and the count d'Affry the French ambassador, repaired with a great multitude of people, to behold the progress and issue of the battle. About noon both ships ran ashore: nevertheless the action was still maintained, until the enemy deserted their quarters: they afterwards abandoned the ship, which was entirely destroyed, after having lost their captain and about one hundred men, who fell in the dispute. The Richmond soon floated, without any damage; and the victory cost her but three men killed, and thirteen wounded. The French court loudly exclaimed against this attack as a violation of the Dutch neutrality, and demanded signal satisfaction for the insult and damage they had sustained. Accordingly the States-General made some remonstrances to the court of London, which found means to remove all misunderstanding on this subject. The Felicité was bound for Martinique, with a cargo valued at thirty thousand pounds, in company with the Hermione, another frigate of the same force and value, which suffered shipwreck on the coast of Dunkirk.

In the course of the same month, captain Hood, commander of the Minerva frigate, cruising in the chops of the Channel, descried a great ship of two decks steering to the westward; and found it was the Warwick, an English ship, which had carried sixty cannon, and been taken by the enemy. She was now mounted with thirty-five guns, and commanded by Mr. le Verger da Belair, with a commission from the French king. Her crew amounted to about three hundred men, including a detachment of soldiers; and she was bound to Pondicherry in the East Indies. Captain Hood, notwithstanding her superior size, attacked her without hesitation, and was very warmly received. Several masts in both ships were shot away, and they fell foul of one another, while the sea ran very high; so that the crews on both sides were greatly encumbered by their broken masts and shattered rigging. At length the waves separated them, and the Warwick fell to leeward. Captain Hood, having cleared ship, bore directly down upon the enemy: then the engagement was renewed, and lasted about an hour; at the expiration of which the captain of the Warwick struck his colours, having lost about fourteen men killed outright, besides thirty wounded. The loss in number of men was equal on board the Minerva, and all her masts went by the board: nevertheless the prize was brought in triumph to Spithead. In the progress of the same cruise captain Hood had also taken the Ecurneil privateer from Bayonne, of fourteen guns, and one hundred and twenty-two men.

On the thirteenth day of March, another French ship, called the Entreprenant, pierced for forty-four guns, but mounted with twenty-six only, having two hundred and three men on board, and a rich cargo, bound for St. Domingo, was encountered near the Land's-end by the Vengeance frigate of twenty-six guns, commanded by captain Nightingale. The action was maintained on both sides with uncommon fury, until the Vengeance being set on fire by the enemy's wadding, the French resolved to take advantage of the confusion produced by this accident, and running their bowsprit upon the taffrail of the English frigate attempted to board her. In this design, however, they miscarried, through the activity of captain Nightingale, who found means to disengage himself, and sheered off to repair his rigging, which had greatly suffered in the engagement. The ship was no sooner in proper condition than he ranged up again close to the enemy, and renewed the contest, which lasted a full hour: then then the Entreprenant bore away. Captain Nightingale, though a second time disabled in his masts and rigging, wore ship, ran within pistol-shot, and began a third vigorous attack, which lasted an hour and a half before the enemy called for quarter. Fifteen of their men were killed, and about twice that number wounded. The victors lost about half as many.

In April another French frigate, called the Comete of two and thirty guns, and two hundred and fifty men, just sailed from Brest, was taken to the westward of Ushant by the Bedford, an English ship of the line, commanded by captain Deane, who conveyed her in safety to Plymouth. About the same period, and near the same place, a fourth frigate of the enemy, called the Pheasant, manned with one hundred and twenty-five mariners, was engaged, taken, and brought to Spithead, by captain Brograve commander of the Albany sloop, whose victory was the cheaper, as the crew of the Pheasant had thrown fourteen of their guns over board during the chase. In the course of the same month a large East-India ship fitted out from France with twenty-eight guns, and three hundred and fifty men, fell in with the Hero and the Venus, commanded by the captains Fortescue and Harrison, and, being taken without opposition, were carried into Plymouth.

The cruisers belonging to the squadron commanded by vice admiral Saunders in the Mediterranean, exerted themselves with no less spirit and activity. In the beginning of this very month, the Oriflame, a French ship of forty guns, being off Cape Tres Foreas, was discovered by the Isis, under the command of captain Wheeler, who overtook her at six in the evening, and a running fight was maintained until half an hour after ten. Captain Wheeler being unfortunately slain in the beginning of the action, the command devolved upon lieutenant Cunningham, who observing at length that the enemy's design was to reach the Spanish shore, boarded her without hesitation; and in a little time, her commander submitting, she was brought into the bay of Gibraltar. The number of her killed and wounded amounted to forty-five, out of a complement of three hundred and seventy: the loss of the Isis did not exceed four killed and nine wounded.

In July another exploit was achieved by a small detachment from the squadron commanded by the same admiral. Captain Proby, in the Thunderer, together with the Modeste, Thetis, and Favourite sloop, being ordered to cruise upon the coast of Spain, with a view to intercept the Achilles and Bouffon, two French ships of war, which lay in the harbour of Cadiz: they at length ventured to come forth, and on the sixteenth day of the month were discovered by the British cruisers. About midnight the Thunderer came up with the Achilles, which struck after a warm engagement of half an hour: yet, in this short action, captain Proby had near forty men killed, and above one hundred wounded, he himself having sustained a slight hurt in the right arm. About seven in the same morning the Thetis attacked the Bouffon, and the fire was maintained on both sides with great resolution for half an hour, when the Modeste ranging up, and firing a few guns, the French captain submitted. His ship and her consort suffered considerably, both in their crews and rigging; nevertheless, the victors carried them safely into the bay of Gibraltar.

One of the most remarkable and gallant actions that distinguished this war, and fully proved the vast superiority which the English had over the French in point of naval discipline; was an incident with which I shall now entertain the reader. On Monday the 10th of August, captain Faulkner of the Bellona, a ship of the line, and captain Logie of the Brilliant, a frigate of thirty guns, sailed from the river Tagus for England, having on board a considerable sum of money for the merchants of London. On Thursday in the afternoon, being then off Vigo, they descried three sail of ships standing in for the land, one of the line of battle, and two frigates. They no sooner observed captain Faulkner, than they bore down upon him, until within the distance of seven miles, when seeing the Bellona and the frigate through the magnifying medium of a hazy atmosphere, they mistook them both for two-decked ships, and dreading the issue of an engagement, resolved to decline the encounter. For this purpose they suddenly wore round, filled all their sails, and crowded away.

Captain Faulkner being by this time convinced of their size, and conjecturing, from the intelligence he had received, that the large ship was the Courageux, which was actually the case, he hoisted all the canvas he could carry, and gave chase until sun-set, when one of the French frigates hauling out in the offing, he displayed a signal to the Brilliant to pursue in that direction; and his order was immediately obeyed. They kept sight of the enemy during the whole night, and at sun-rise, had gained but about two miles upon them in a chase of fourteen hours; so that the French commodore might have still shunned an engagement for the whole day, and enjoyed the chance of escaping in the darkness of the succeeding night; but he no longer declined the action. The air being perfectly serene, he now perceived that one of the English ships was a frigate; and the Bellona herself, which was one of the best constituted ships in the English navy, appeared to him, at a distance, to be considerably smaller than she really was. The French commander therefore, being a man of spirit, hoisted a red ensign on the mizen shrouds, as a signal for his two frigates to close with, and engage the Brilliant. At the same time he hauled down his studing-sails, wore round, and stood for the Bellona under his top-sails; while captain Faulkner advanced towards her with an easy sail, and ordered his quarters to be manned.

The sea was undulated by a gentle breeze, which facilitated the working of the ships, and at the same time permitted the full use of their heavy artillery. The two ships were equal in burthen, in number of guns, and in weight of metal. The crew on board of the Courageux, amounted to seven hundred men, able to stand to their quarters; and they were commanded by M. du Guy Lambert, an officer of approved valour and ability. The Bellona's complement consisted of five hundred and fifty chosen men, accustomed to discipline, and inured to service. All the officers were gentlemen of known merit, and the commander had on many occasions distinguished himself by his bravery and conduct. The fire on both sides was suspended until they were within musket-shot of each other, and then the engagement began with a dreadful discharge of fire-arms and artillery. In less than nine minutes, all the Bellona's braces, bowlings, shrouds, and rigging were cut and shattered by the shot, and the mizen-mast fell over the stern, with all the men on the round top, who, nevertheless saved their lives, by clambering into the port-holes of the gun-room.

Capt. Faulkner, apprehensive that the enemy might seize this opportunity of escaping, gave orders to board them immediately; an attempt which the position of the two ships soon rendered altogether impracticable. The Courageux was now falling athwart the fore-foot, or bows of the Bellona, in which case the English ship must have been raked fore and aft with great execution. The haul yards, and most of the other ropes by which the Bellona could be worked, were already shot away. Captain Faulkner, however, with the assistance of his master, made use of the studding sails with such dexterity, as to wear the ship quite round, and fall upon the opposite quarter of the Courageux. His presence of mind and activity in this delicate situation, were not more admirable than the discipline and dispatch of his officers and men, who observing this change in their position, flew to the guns on the other side, now opposed to the enemy, from whence they poured in a most terrible discharge, and maintained it without intermission or abatement. Every shot took place, and bore destruction along with it. The sides of the Courageux were shattered and torn by every successive broadside, and her decks were strewed with carnage. About twenty minutes did the enemy sustain the havock made by this battery, so incessantly plied, and so fatally directed. At length it became so intolerable, that the French ensign was hauled down: the rage of battle ceased: the English mariners had left their quarters, and the officers congratulated each other on the success of the day. At this juncture a shot being unexpectedly fired from the lower tier of the Courageux, the British seamen ran to their quarters, and, without orders, poured in two broadsides upon the enemy, who now called for quarter, and an end was put to the engagement.

The damage done to the rigging of the Bellona was considerable, but she suffered very little in the hull, and the number of the killed and wounded did not exceed forty. The case was very different with the Courageux, which now appeared like a wreck upon the water. Nothing was seen standing but her foremast, and bowsprit; large breaches were made in her sides: her decks were torn up in several parts; many of her guns were dismounted; and her quarters were filled with the mangled bodies of the dying and the dead. Above two hundred and twenty were killed outright, and half that number was brought ashore wounded to Lisbon, to which place the prize was conducted. Captain Faulkner was not more commendable for his gallantry in the action, than for the humanity and politeness with which he treated his prisoners, whose grateful acknowledgment, and unsolicited applause, constitute the fairest testimony that a man of honour can receive. Nor ought we to withhold our praise from captain Logie, of the Brilliant, to whose valour and dexterity the success of the commodore was, in a great measure owing. Finding it would be impossible for him to acquire any thing but laurels from two frigates, the least of which was equal in strength to the ship he commanded; he resolved to amuse them both, so as to prevent either from assisting the Courageux. He accordingly began the action by engaging one of them, called la Malicieuse. The other coming up, he withstood their joint efforts, so as to employ their whole fire, while the great ships were engaged, and even above half an hour after the Courageux had struck her colours. Finally, he obliged them both to sheer off, and to consult their safety in flight, after they had suffered considerably in their masts and rigging.

Captain Faulkner returned to Lisbon with this prize, which had well nigh perished by accident, before he reached the Tagus. A cask of spirituous liquor catching fire near one of the magazines, the ship must have blown up, had not she been saved by the presence of mind and resolution of Mr. Male, the first lieutenant. Perceiving the flames already communicated to some combustibles that happened to be in the way, he leaped down the hatch-way into the midst of them, and by his personal endeavours, they were happily extinguished. The centinel who had kindled the fire by admitting a candle too near the spirits, was burned to death; and twenty French prisoners hearing the alarm, leaped into the sea, where they perished. When the French arrived at Lisbon, they applied to their own consul for relief, but without any effect: the gentlemen, therefore, of the English factory, moved with compassion for their sufferings, and their destitute situation, generously raised a subscription of two hundred and thirty pounds sterling, for their support.

No other advantage of importance, was obtained over the enemy in this part of the world; but some successful exploits were performed in the East and West-Indies. After the reduction of Pondicherry on the coast of Coromandel, an armament was equipped against the French settlement of Mahie, situated on the coast of Malabar, about thirty miles to the northward of Tillycherry. A body of forces was embarked at Bombay for this expedition, under the command of major Hector Monro, who took his measures so well, in concert with Mr. Hodges, commander for the English at Tillycherry, and acted with so much spirit in the execution of the scheme, that in the beginning of February, Mr. Louer, commander in chief of the French garrison at Mahie, surrendered the place with all its dependencies. Though this acquisition was of no great consequence to the English, merely as a trading port, the loss of it was severely felt by the enemy, who had fortified it at a considerable expence, and mounted the fortifications with above two hundred pieces of cannon.

The French officers in the East-Indies, notwithstanding the loss of Pondicherry, exerted themselves with so much industry, as to interest in their cause a prince of the Mogul empire, called the Shah Zadda, who took the field at the head of fourscore thousand men, against the forces of the English East-India company, commanded by major John Carnack, and reinforced by the suba of Bengal. This whole army consisted of five hundred Europeans, two thousand five hundred sepoy, and twenty thousand thousand black troops, with twelve pieces of cannon. Both armies advanced to the neighbourhood of Guya, and on the fifteenth day of January the Mogul troops were routed in a pitched battle. All their artillery was taken, together with part of their baggage, and a number of French officers, including Mr. Law, their principal commander. The shah made an effort to join two rajas, who had taken up arms against the suba; but, receiving intelligence, that they were already defeated by the English troops, he surrendered at discretion to the suba, who treated him with great respect, and promised, with the assistance of the English company, to support him in his pretensions to the Mogul empire.

This series of prosperity could hardly be said to be interrupted by the successful attempts of the count d'Estaing, who, with a small squadron, had, in the year 1759, made himself master of the English fort of Bender-Abassi, in the gulph of Persia, and taken two frigates, with three other vessels belonging to the company. In the succeeding year the fort of Natal surrendered to him at discretion, and he found two ships in the road. After these exploits, he sailed to Sumatra, where he reduced Bencouli, Tapanopoli, and Marlborough fort; which last, though in a good state of defence, was, after a very weak resistance, given up by the garrison. This bold adventurer, however, could not derive so much honour from the success of his expedition, as disgrace from having made it contrary to the most sacred laws of arms; for, at this period, it is well known he was no other than a prisoner on parole. Neither did the English interest suffer any thing from a revolution, which was, at this time, effected, in favour of Mir Cossim Ali Kawn, who was placed on the throne of Bengal in the room of his father-in-law Jaffier Ali Cawn, who had been raised to that dignity by the celebrated lord Clive, and who was now deposed for his cruelty and mal-administration. On the contrary, the privileges and immunities of the English company were confirmed and enlarged by the new nabob.

In the course of the preceding month a severe blow was given to the Dutch company settled at the island of Ceylon, lying off Cape Comorin, the extremity of the peninsula of Indus. This company, having discontinued the payment of certain duties demanded by the king of Candia, and being suspected of a design to render that kingdom tributary to their power; the prince marched with a considerable army against their settlements; surprised Point de Galle, and having taken Colombo, their principal establishment, massacred all that were found in it, without distinction of sex or age. Then he ordered his troops to hew down all the cinnamon and other spice trees that grew in that part of the country to which the European traders had access, and threatened to extirpate every Dutch family from the island.

During this campaign the English arms were no less successful in America than in Asia. In the beginning of July, colonel Grant, at the head of two thousand six hundred men, began his march from Fort Prince George, on the frontiers of Carolina, for the country of the Cherokees, which he determined to ravage with fire and sword. On the tenth day of the month, he was attacked on his march by a body of Indians, who fired for some time with great vivacity, but little effect; and then disappeared. After this attempt he met with no opposition in traversing their country. He reduced fifteen towns to ashes, besides little villages and farm-houses; destroyed about fourteen hundred acres of corn, drove the inhabitants to starve in the mountains, and filled their whole nation with dismay.

This terror produced the desired effect, and compelled them to sue for peace. A deputation of their chiefs waited on the colonel, to explain their distresses, and signify their sentiments on the subject, and he forwarded them to the lieutenant-governor at Charles-Town, where a new treaty was actually concluded. Sir William Johnson made a tour round the other Indian nations, in order to quiet their fears, aroused at the conquests of Great-Britain; which fears the French emissaries had fomented with their usual industry and success. A conference was held between the Six Nations and some of the American governors, in order to ratify the treaties subsisting with those tribes; but a warm dispute arose from a demand of certain lands, made by a Delaware chief, who complained that the English settlers had taken possession of them in consequence of a fraudulent purchase; and tho' the rising animosity was stifled for the present, it soon gave occasion to those barbarous massacres, which were afterwards committed by these savages. The more northern Indians, settled on the frontiers of Nova Scotia, seemed extremely well-pleased with their new protectors and allies. Their chiefs in great numbers visited the governor of Halifax, owned their dependance on the king of Great-Britain, and, in token of perpetual friendship and alliance, buried the hatchet with the usual solemnity.

In the West-Indies, rear admiral Holmes, commander of the squadron at Jamaica, conducted his cruisers with equal judgment and success. Having received intelligence in the beginning of June, that several ships of war belonging to the enemy had sailed from Port Louis, and in particular, that the St. Anne had just quitted Port au Prince, he forthwith made such a disposition of his squadron as was most likely to intercept them; and on the thirteenth day of the month he himself in the Hampshire fell in with the St. Anne, and chased her to leeward down upon the Centaur. Her captain discovering this last ship, hauled up between them, ran close in shore, until he was becalmed, about a league to the northward of Donna Maria bay. Then he began to fire his stern-chase; but when the Centaur came along-side, he struck his colours, and surrendered. The St. Anne was a beautiful new ship, pierced for sixty-four cannon, but mounting only forty, manned with near four hundred mariners and soldiers, under the command of Mr. Aiguillon, and loaded with a rich cargo of coffee, indigo, and sugar. Nor was the squadron stationed off the Leeward Islands, under the conduct of Sir James Douglas, less alert and successful in protecting the British traders, and clearing those seas of the Martinico privateers, of which he took a great number.

In the month of June, the Island of Dominique, which the French had settled and fortified, was attacked and reduced by a small body of troops commanded by lord Rollo, and conducted thither from Guadaloupe by Sir James Douglas, with four ships of the line, and some frigates. Two officers being sent on shore at Roseau, with a manifesto addressed to the inhabitants, two deputies came off in order to treat of a surrender; but the first transports of their fear subsiding, and monsieur Longprie, their governor, encouraging them to stand upon their defence, they afterwards refused to submit, and manned their intrenchments with a face of resolution. The ships immediately anchored close to the shore, and a disposition was made for disembarking. The troops landed in the evening, and formed on the beach-side, under the fire of the squadron. Lord Rollo, seeing the forces galled by an irregular fire from trees and bushes; considering that the entrenchments commanded the town, which he had already occupied; that the country was naturally strong, and the enemy might be reinforced before morning, determined wisely to attack their entrenchments without delay; and this service was performed by himself and colonel Melville at the head of the grenadiers, with such vigour and success, that the enemy were driven successively from all their batteries and intrenchments: Mr. Longprie, their commandant, and some other officers, were taken at their head quarters. Next day the inhabitants submitted, delivered up their arms, and took the oaths of allegiance to his Britannic majesty. Thus the whole island was conquered at a very small expence, and a defensible post established at Roseau by the British commander.

Very little of consequence happened in the British settlements on the coast of Africa, except the destruction of the town of Goree, which was accidentally set on fire; and an attempt on James fort, in the mouth of the river Gambia, by two French snows, one of which perished by running on shore, and the other sailed away, after having suffered considerable damage.

With regard to the transactions in the British channel, a powerful squadron had been stationed all the winter in the bay of Quiberon, under the command of Sir Edward Hawke and Sir Charles Hardy. In the month of January, they took two small French frigates bound to the coast of Guiney, and a few merchant-ships of little value; and in the month of March the two admirals returned to Spithead: but another squadron was afterwards sent to occupy the same station. In the month of July, while the English were employed in demolishing the fortifications on the isle of Aix, the great ships that protected this service were attacked by a French armament from the Charente, consisting of six prames[†], a few row-gallies, and a great number of launches crowded with men. They dropped down with the ebb, and placing themselves between the isle d'Enet and fort Fouras, played upon the English ships in Aix road, with twelve mortars, and seventy large cannon;

but they met with such a warm reception from the British squadron, that in a few hours they retreated to their former station, where the water was too shallow for the English ships to pursue them.

These were part of that armament which had been formerly equipped for the reduction of Belleisle, and which the British ministry were now determined, at all events, to subdue. Belleisle lies four leagues from the point of Quiberon, about half way between Port Louis and the mouth of the Loire. It extends about six leagues in length, and little more than two in breadth; contains a pretty large town called Palais, fortified with a citadel, besides a good number of villages, and the whole number of inhabitants, exclusive of the garrison, may amount to six thousand, chiefly maintained by the fishery of pilchards. It was supposed the reduction of this island would be easily achieved, and the conquest attended with manifold advantages: that it would alarm the French nation, and oblige them to maintain a numerous body of forces on the opposite continent; consequently make a considerable diversion in favour of the British army in the north of Germany: that its central situation would render it an effectual check upon Port l'Orient, and disable the enemy from equipping any naval armament at Brest; as all the materials for building and fitting out ships in time of war, were brought thither from Port Louis, Nantz, and Rochfort, through the channel between Belleisle and the main land, which conveyance, they could not pretend to use, if the English were masters of Belleisle: finally, that as all the French ships homeward bound from the East and West Indies, as well as from other parts of the world, ran in with the land, so as first to make Belleisle, the English, by keeping a small squadron between the island and the main, and a good look-out in the offing, would be able to make prize of all those vessels.

The troops destined for this expedition, amounted to ten battalions under the command of major-general Hodgson, assisted by major-general Crauford, with proper engineers, some troops of light-horse, and a detachment of artillery. The squadron, besides transports, consisted of ten ships of the line, several frigates, two fire-ships, and two bomb-ketches, commanded by commodore Keppel, brother to the earl of Albemarle, a gallant officer, who had signalized himself on several occasions, in the course of this and the last war. The whole armament sailed from Spithead on the twenty-ninth day of March; and on the seventh of April came to anchor in the great road of Belleisle, where a disposition was made for landing the forces. The commanders having agreed that the descent should be made on the sandy beach, near the point of Lomaria, towards the south-east end of the island, a feint was made to attack the citadel of Palais, while two large ships convoyed the troops to the landing-place, and silenced a battery which the enemy had there erected. This service being performed, the flat-bottomed boats advanced to the shore, and a small body of troops landed under the command of major Purcel and captain Osborn; but the enemy, who had intrenched themselves on the heights, appeared suddenly above them, and poured down such a severe fire, as threw them into confusion, and intimidated the rest of the troops from landing.

Captain Osborne, at the head of sixty grenadiers, advanced with great intrepidity so near as to exchange several thrusts with the French officer, until having received three shots in the body, he fell dead on the spot. Major Purcel shared the same fate, which was extended to several other officers. In a word, this handful of men being over-powered with numbers, were totally routed, and either killed or taken prisoners; so that this attempt was attended with the loss of near five hundred men, including two sea-officers, and about fifty mariners belonging to the ships that endeavoured to cover the landing. This discouraging check was succeeded by tempestuous weather, which damaged some of the transports. When the storm abated, the Prince of Orange ship of war sailed round the island, in order to survey the coast, and discover, if possible, some other place for disembarkation; but the whole seemed to be secured by rocks and batteries in such a manner, as precluded all access.

Notwithstanding this unfavourable prospect, another scheme was laid, and the execution of it crowned with success. On the twenty-second day of the month, in the morning, the troops were disposed in the flat-bottomed boats, and rowed to different parts of the island, as if they intended to land in different places; by which means the attention of the enemy was distracted in such a manner, that they knew not where to expect the descent, and were obliged to divide their forces at random. Mean while brigadier Lambert pitched upon the rocky point of Lomaria, where captain Paterfon, at the head of Beauclerk's grenadiers, and captain Murray, with a detachment of marines, climbed the precipice with surprising intrepidity, and sustained the fire of a strong body of the enemy, until they were supported by the rest of the English troops, who now landed in great numbers. Then the French abandoned their batteries, and retired with precipitation: but this advantage was not gained without bloodshed. About forty men were killed, and a considerable number wounded, including colonel Mackenzie and captain Murray, of the marines, who seemed to vie with the marching regiments in valour and activity, and captain Paterfon of Beauclerk's grenadiers, who lost his arm in the dispute. Monsieur de St. Croix, the governor, perceiving that all the English troops were disembarked, to the number of eight thousand men, recalled all his detachments to Palais, and prepared for a vigorous defence, his forces, now joined by the militia of the island, amounting to four thousand men fit for service.

On the twenty-third of April, the English troops were formed into columns, and began their march towards the capital of the island. Next day general Hodgson ordered a detachment of light horse to take post at Sauzon; and on the twenty-fifth, a corps of infantry took possession of a village called Bordilla, where they began to throw up an entrenchment; but they were dislodged by a party of the enemy's grenadiers: the whole army, however, entrenched itself in the neighbourhood. The artillery and implements of siege for breaking ground, being still on board the fleet, and the tempestuous weather rendering it impossible to send them ashore, the French governor took this opportunity to erect six redoubts, to defend the avenues of Palais; and these were finished with admirable skill and activity, before general Hodgson had it in his power to begin his operations. All that he could do, in the mean time, was to publish a manifesto, directed to the inhabitants, importing, that, if they would put themselves under the protection of the British government, they should be indulged with the free exercise of their religion, and retain all the rights and privileges, which they had ever enjoyed. This promise had a considerable influence upon the natives, a good number of whom immediately accepted the proposal.

The next step the general took was to summon the commandant, who continued encamped under the walls of the citadel, and declared he would defend the place to the last extremity; and indeed it must be owned, for the honour of this gentleman, that, in the course of the siege, he performed every thing that could be expected from a brave and experienced officer. About the latter end of April, some mortars being brought up, began to play upon the town, within the walls of which the enemy now took shelter; and at this time Sir William Peere Williams, a young gentleman of great merit and expectations, and captain in Burgoyne's light horse, was shot by a French sentinel, in reconnoitring their works.

The besiegers broke ground on the second of May; but next night the trenches were attacked by the enemy with such vigour, that the piquets on the left were put in disorder. Major-general Crawford, who commanded in the trenches, rallied the troops, and endeavoured to animate them by his own example; but on this occasion they did not act with their usual spirit; some hundreds were killed, and the major-general with his two aids du camp fell into the hands of the enemy, who retreated without having made any attempt upon the right, where the piquets stood their ground, determined to give them a warm reception. The damage they had done was next day repaired: a redoubt was begun near the right of their works; and from this period the operations of the siege were prosecuted with unremitting vigour, notwithstanding a severe fire maintained without interruption, and a succession of well-concerted sallies, which were not executed without a considerable effusion of blood.

The engineers giving it as their opinion that the works could not be properly advanced, until the French redoubts should be taken, the general made the disposition for the attack, which began on the thirteenth at day-break. A terrible fire from four pieces of cannon, and above thirty co-horns, was poured into the redoubt on the right of the enemy's flank: then a detachment of marines supported by part of Loudon's regiment, advanced to the parapet, drove the French from the works, and, after a very obstinate dispute with their bayonets fixed, took possession of the place. All the other five were reduced, one after another, by the same detachment, reinforced by Colvil's regiment, under the command of colonel Teesdale and major Nesbitt; and a considerable slaughter was made of the enemy, who withdrew into the citadel in great confusion. Such was the ardour of the assailants, that they entered the streets of Palais pell-mell with the fugitives, made a good number of prisoners, and took possession of the town, in which they found the French hospital, and some English prisoners, who had been taken in different sallies.

The English being now masters of the whole island, except the citadel of Palais, bent all their endeavours to the reduction of this fortress, which was very strong both by art and nature, and defended with uncommon courage and perseverance on the side of the besiegers. Parallels were finished, barricadoes made, and batteries erected; and an incessant fire from mortars and artillery was mutually maintained, by night and by day, from the thirteenth of May to the twenty fifth, when that of the enemy began to abate. In the course of such desperate service, a great number of men must have been killed, and many died of distemper.

The island was in itself so barren, and monsieur de St. Croix had taken such effectual precautions to remove its produce, that the English army had neither fresh provision nor refreshments, except what was brought by sea from England. From thence, indeed, they were tolerably well furnished with live cattle: they were also reinforced by one regiment from Portsmouth, and another from the island of Jersey. By the end of May a breach was made in the citadel; and notwithstanding the indefatigable industry of the garrison and the governor, in repairing the damage, the fire of the besiegers increased to such a degree, that great part of their defences was ruined, and the breach became practicable by the seventh day of June, when monsieur de St. Croix, being apprehensive of a general assault, demanded a capitulation. He was indulged with the most honourable conditions, in consideration of the noble defence he had made. The articles were immediately signed and executed, and Beauclerk's grenadiers took possession of the citadel.

Whatever might be the opinion of politicians concerning the value of this conquest, and the price at which it was purchased, certain it is, that the rejoicings in England were sincere and universal. Great and deserved applause was bestowed upon the land and sea officers employed in this expedition, who, with so noble a perseverance, had encountered and overcome such mighty difficulties, and who, after such a severe check on their outset, had the spirit to renew the attack under circumstances nearly as unfavourable as those by which they had at first been repulsed. The citizens of London addressed the king on the occasion, and their example was followed by most of the towns and corporations in the kingdom.

While the war thus raged, with uncommon violence, in almost every quarter of the universe, a negotiation was set on foot for putting an end to the troubles, which had so long distracted the several nations of Europe. I have already observed, that the contending powers had agreed to open a general congress at Augsburg; and the British plenipotentiaries were actually nominated for this purpose; when the French king made proposals of a separate pacification with England, under the mediation of the Spanish monarch. Accordingly, after the mutual exchange of several letters and memorials between the two courts, ministers were sent from both kingdoms; Mr. Stanley on the part of England, and M. Buffy on that of France. In order to smooth as much as possible, the way to peace, it was previously resolved by both parties, to establish some certain and simple points that might serve to direct and facilitate the whole negotiation. These points were only two; and even these so inseparably connected with each other, that they seemed rather members of the same proposition than separate articles. The first was, "that the two crowns should remain in possession of what they had conquered one from the other." The second imported, that "the situation in which they should stand at certain periods, should be the position to serve as a basis for the treaty which might be negotiated between the two powers."

As France was known to have had the worst in the war, a proposition of this kind coming from her must have appeared an instance of moderation, altogether surprizing to our ministers. It is certain, that had peace been concluded at that instant, and upon the sole foundation of this article, England would have possessed all the conquests she had made, every one of which was in a very high degree advantageous to her commerce and her power, and none of which could be considered as a subject of future discussion. On the other hand, France by continuing in possession of the places she had conquered, would have acquired no advantage that could balance the expence of keeping them; while she would, at the same time, be exposed to endless altercations, and draw upon herself the jealousy and indignation of her nearest allies. This basis certainly gave the English a vast superiority in the negotiation; and it was natural to expect, that when they came to talk of restitutions, the evacuation of the French conquests in Germany would be purchased at a much smaller price, than their apparent magnitude might seem to demand. However, these were still a matter of so much anxiety, and the nature of the precise stipulations so uncertain, that the negotiation, though it proceeded with strong appearance of a desire for peace, met with very frequent checks and delays. Both parties were indeed unanimous in the article of 'uti possidetis;' and it must be admitted, that there could not be a better ground to treat upon. But as the war still continued, and whilst it continued might daily make an alteration in the fortune of the contracting powers, it was necessary to fix upon some epochas to which this possessory article should refer.

The French accordingly proposed, that the situation in which they should stand on the first of September, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-one, in the East-Indies; on the first of July in the West-Indies and Africa; and on the first of May following in Europe, should be the position or basis to the treaty which might be negotiated between the two powers. They added, that as these epochas might seem too near or too distant for the interest of Great-Britain, they were extremely willing to enter into a negotiation upon that object.

The English ministry received this proposition with less satisfaction than its apparent fairness deserved. They entirely rejected the French epochas; and declared they could not admit, without prejudice to themselves, any other epochas than those which have reference to the day of signing the treaty of peace. Had this resolution been strictly adhered to, it was evident that the negotiation was that moment at an end: for though what was asserted in the French memorial in reply to this declaration, that the basis of the proposition of 'uti possidetis' was necessarily connected with the particular epochas proposed, is by no means to be admitted; yet, on the other hand, it is easy to deny the validity of their subsequent assertion, "that if not these, at least some certain periods during the war ought to be fixed; and that the uti possidetis could not reasonably have reference only to the time of signing the treaty of peace." For if the contrary principle were once admitted, it would be difficult to know, or even to guess with probability at the nature or the value of the possessions which by such an article should be mutually given away. And if those difficulties occurred in the simplicity of a possessory article, they must be prodigiously increased upon every other, and at length come to such a height as to preclude all possibility of negotiating on things of so intricate a nature as exchanges and equivalents. The French in their memorial insisted so strongly on the propriety of establishing these periods, that they threatened to recall the whole proposition if they were refused.

Here it may not be amiss to observe, that though the courts of London and Versailles treated separately, it was hitherto by no means proposed, that this separate discussion should lead to a separate peace. It was no more than a previous arrangement for the removal of those difficulties, which might prevent the peace of France with England from being united with the general peace of Europe. But in proportion as the treaty advanced, it became obvious that the settling of any terms, which had no reference to the signing of something obligatory between the two crowns, could at best be only void and illusory, and might in the end even prove the source of dangerous and captious altercations. The English Minister therefore, before he could agree to treat definitively upon any point, and particularly upon the epochas, insisted upon two preliminary conditions.

First, that every thing, which should be happily adjusted between the two crowns in relation to their particular war, should be made obligatory, final and conclusive, independant of the state of the negotiation at Augsburg.

Secondly, that the definitive treaty of peace between Great Britain and France, or preliminary articles to that end, should be signed and ratified between the date of that memorial and the first of the following August.

If these conditions were accepted, then England on her part consented to name determinate epochas to which the uti possidetis should refer; the first of July for Europe; the first of September for Africa and America; and the first of November for the East Indies. The French ministry, without contest-ing the epochas themselves, complained of the conditions; of the first, because they said it departed from the letter and spirit of the memorial of the twenty-sixth of March, which was the foundation of the whole treaty; of the second, on account of the extreme shortness of the time allotted for the discussion of such difficult and momentous points; and the adjustment of matters which regarded a war extended over the four quarters of the globe; for the memorial which contained those conditions was dated on the seventeenth, and was not received at Paris until the end of June, so that little more than a month was left to obtain the consent of the court of Vienna to a separate treaty, to settle the terms of that treaty, and, finally, to ratify every particular.

If a very good understanding had not subsisted between her Imperial Majesty and the king of France, it must have been very difficult to have received this consent. But in fact it was immediately received, and upon one very short and apparently reasonable condition, "That nothing might be stipulated to the prejudice of the house of Austria." But when this condition came to be explained, as we shall see presently, it was so far from facilitating, that it created new obstacles to the peace. However, this acquiescence of the principal of her allies enabled France to accept of the first condition without reserve; and to the last she also agreed verbally, though not in the clearest terms.

Every thing seemed for the present in the best situation, which in this stage of the treaty could be expected. The basis of the negotiation was solidly established. The article uti possidetis, after the taking Belleisle, was a matter of less difficulty, and the epochas were in general settled in such a manner, as to coincide with the designs and desires of both parties. The treaty was confined to the two powers, and it was to be perfectly definitive with regard to them. A time for concluding it was also in a great measure settled; a circumstance, which if it did not admit sufficient leisure for accurate discussion, cut off at least the opportunities of chicane, and seemed to be the most suitable to a candid proceeding, and a sincere desire of peace.

The foundation being thus laid, the superstructure consisted in the adjustment of those compensations which were to be made for the reciprocal conquests, and here the whole difficulty of the two powers lay; a punctilio of honour might have intervened at the very first setting out, extremely pernicious to the salutary work in hand, from which party the first proposition should proceed: but in this respect France gave way, and that concession afforded no inconsiderable proof of her pacific intentions.

The uti possidetis being settled as the basis of the treaty, nothing could reasonably be claimed by either party, that was not to be counterpoised by some equivalent from the other; and consequently it was necessary to adjust and value their several possessions, pretensions, and demands. There were six principal objects in this negotiation. First, the limits of the two crowns in North America. Secondly, the conquests of Great-Britain in the West-Indies, together with the neutral islands there. Thirdly, the English Conquests in Africa and in India. Fourthly, the adjustment of the particular affair between the English and French in Germany. Fifthly, the conduct which the two crowns were to observe with regard to their respective allies in Germany. And, lastly, the Restitution of the captures made by England, previous to the declaration of war.

On the first of these articles, France proposed to cede and guaranty all Canada to England; stipulating only that the free and public exercise of the Roman Catholic religion should be permitted under the English government, and that those of the old French colonists who chose to retire might have leave to transport themselves from thence, and take away or dispose of their effects. In compensation for this, they required a confirmation of the privilege of what fishing they enjoyed on the coast of Newfoundland, under the treaty of Utrecht; and, that this fishery might be carried on with advantage, they likewise required the restitution of the isle of Cape Breton, excluding themselves from erecting on that island any kind of fortification whatsoever.

The affairs in the West Indies, which made the second capital object, they purposed to settle in this manner: they offered to exchange Minorca for Guadaloupe and Marigalante; and as to the four neutral islands, they insisted that two of them, Dominica and St. Vincent, were held by their natural inhabitants the Caribbees, under the protection of France, and that they ought still to remain in the same condition. With regard to the two others, they proposed to make a fair division; that St. Lucia should remain to France, and that England should enter into possession of Tobago. On this head, it is sufficient to observe, that in the opinion of some people, the English ministry did not, in this treaty, set the just value on the acquisition they had made, when they looked upon Canada as the great and leading object, and only considered Guadaloupe and Marigalante in a secondary and subordinate light. This is a question of difficulty, and has been much agitated. Those who dreaded a fresh American war, from the ambition of France, and were struck with the idea of extended empire, preferred the former conquest; those who solely considered the interest of England as a commercial people, were generally in favour of the latter.

On the side of Africa, France satisfied herself with demanding either the Settlement at Senegal, or the isle of Goree; for which, together with the restoration of Belleisle, they consented to evacuate Gottingen, Hesse, and Hanau, and to draw off their army to the Maine and the Rhine. This was certainly a full equivalent. But with regard to the East-Indies, they had no tolerable equivalent to offer. They expatiated much in their memorial upon the disadvantages which would arise to the companies of the two nations, from their entertaining views of conquests, so contrary to the true spirit and real interest of those trading establishments; and they concluded, by proposing the treaty formerly settled between the sieurs Godcheau and Saunders as a basis for the re-establishment of peace in Asia. It must be remarked, that this treaty had been concluded at a time when the affairs of France in the East-Indies made a very different figure than during this negotiation; and therefore it seemed unfair to make this treaty a standard under circumstances altogether inapplicable.

The war, which had been so long, with so much bloodshed, and so fruitlessly carried on in Westphalia, the French strenuously contended was from the time of, what they called, the breach of capitulation of Closter-Seven, a war purely English; and therefore that their conquests in that part of Germany, formed a proper compensation for the English conquests in the other quarters of the world. The British ministers did not attempt formally to refute this assertion; they rather seemed to admit it, and agreed accordingly, to receive the evacuation of those places as an equivalent for cessions to be made on the footing we have already mentioned. On this point there was little difficulty.

The intricate and knotty part was on what we have stated as the fifth object, the conduct of the two crowns with regard to their allies. There was a real, a capital difficulty. From the beginning of the negotiation, England had declared that she would inviolably preserve her faith to the king of Prussia, and would act strenuously in his support. This piqued the French ministers, who, in their turn, thought themselves bound to make a declaration equally strong in favour of the empress; and they had, moreover, recently contracted with the court of Vienna, to admit nothing in the treaty to her disadvantage. However, in this difficulty, they found out a solution, which, it must be confessed, had a very fair and captivating appearance. They proposed that both armies in Germany should observe an exact neutrality; and should be reciprocally bound to afford no sort of assistance, nor to give no sort of offence, to the allies of either of the parties. And they proposed further, that as armies in this state of inert neutrality must be a dead and useless expence to the power who maintains them, the French king, from the time his Britannic majesty recalled the English forces from Germany, would cause double the number of French forces from the armies of the Upper and Lower Rhine to return into France; and that no French troops should remain in Germany, but in proportion to those which the king of England should keep in his pay. It might certainly be urged, in confirmation of the propriety of this offer, that in reality these armies, whilst they continued in action, though they worried each other abundantly, offered no kind of assistance to their allies; and therefore when they came mutually to entertain pacific sentiments concerning their own particular quarrel, and were to give an example of moderation to the rest of Europe, there seemed to be no reason why they should make efforts in favour of any ally which they had not made, or been able to make in the hottest time of hostility.

The last article had its difficulties also. The French insisted, as a point from which they were resolved never to recede, upon the restitution of the captures made before the declaration of war. This demand, they were of opinion, was grounded on the clearest principles of the law of nations, and the most express stipulation of treaties. Without entering into those various arguments with which this position might be maintained and attacked, it appeared to many that the honour of both nations was almost equally concerned, the one to claim, the other as resolutely to refuse this restitution.

On the whole, these proposals, which the French sent to London in a memorial of the fifteenth of July, formed, though in some respects undoubtedly exceptionable, a very agreeable plan for a treaty of peace. A better could not have been expected in the first project of an enemy, and it might be hoped, that a negotiation thus favourably begun, could not fail of adjusting easily whatever appeared wrong, or supplying whatever was defective in this first draught of the propositions. But fatally for the repose of mankind, in the very instant that this fair proposal was made, at the very moment when these strong demonstrations were given, an act was done which blew up at one explosion, the whole basis of the treaty that had been long and carefully laying, scattered the materials which had been so industriously collected, and so cautiously arranged, and instead of extinguishing spread the flames of war much further, and made them rage with new fury. From this period all the whole transaction was carried on with animosity, resentment, and mistrust. Before and during this negotiation, the French ministry had used every art and intrigue in their power to interest the king of Spain in their quarrel, and infuse a jealousy into that monarch of the success of the British arms. Hitherto, however, there was no appearance that these measures had any effect; but to the infinite surprise and indignation of the British minister, M. de Bussy, the French agent, delivered with the paper which contained the above propositions, a private memorial, signifying, that in order to establish the peace upon solid foundations, not to be shaken by the contested interests of a third power, the king of Spain might be invited to accede to guaranty the treaty; and that to prevent the differences which subsisted between Great-Britain and this monarchy from being a means of producing a fresh war in Europe, with the consent and communication of his Catholic majesty, he proposed, that in this negotiation, the three points which had been disputed between the crowns of England and Spain, might be finally settled. First, the restitution of some captures made upon the Spanish flag. Secondly, the privilege of the Spanish nation to fish on the banks of Newfoundland. Thirdly, the demolition of the English settlements made on the Spanish territories in the bay of Honduras.

It may be easily imagined, from the character of the secretary of state, who then sat at the helm of affairs, in what manner he received these proposals: he rejected with the utmost contempt the offer of finishing a negotiation, through the mediation of an humbled enemy, relating to disputes with a power actually in friendship with England. He called upon the Spanish minister to disavow the propositions, which had been said to be made with the knowledge of his court. He returned as wholly inadmissible this offensive memorial, declaring, that it would be looked upon as an affront to the dignity of his master, and incompatible with the sincerity of the negotiation, to make any further mention of such a circumstance.

He therefore immediately prepared an answer to the principal memorial, in a style rather dictated by the circumstances which accompanied that paper, and which sufficiently indicated the designs of France, than what the propositions themselves strictly deserved. He had indeed, by this time, conceived an incurable suspicion of the sincerity of France in the whole proceeding, and therefore it would not have been prudent to have made those advances, which on a supposition of good faith, and pacific intentions, might possibly have been advisable: for though both powers had over and over declared, that their respective propositions, if the treaty should by any accident be broken off, would be considered as retracted or never made; yet it is certain, that things once settled and agreed to, unavoidably stamp their own impression upon any future negotiation, relative to the same subject.

Mr. Pitt's answer, which is dated on the twenty-ninth of July, agreed to the restitution of Guadeloupe, Marigalante, and Belleisle, on the compensations proposed by France. It agreed also to receive Canada, but without any new limits or any exception whatsoever; and it added to the French the offer of all Canada, and its appurtenances. It admitted the proposal of the partition of the neutral islands. It rejected the French demand of Cape Breton, or any other island in the gulph or river of St. Laurence, or of any power of fishing in that river, in that gulph, or on those coasts: but allowed the privilege of fishing on the banks of Newfoundland, on consideration of the demolition of Dunkirk. But the proposed restitution either of Senegal or Goree was utterly refused. The German neutrality was rejected with disdain; and it was declared that Great Britain unalterably resolved to support the king of Prussia with efficacy and good faith. In addition to the offer made to evacuate Hesse, &c. it was insisted that the French should make a general evacuation of all her conquests in Westphalia, and all its countries, including her conquests from the king of Prussia on the Rhine, though France had before declared, that they were conquered for the queen of Hungary, that they were actually governed in her name, and that she could not, consistently with good faith, agree to deliver them to the king of Prussia. The treaty between Saunders and Godcheau was not admitted as a proper basis for a treaty relative to the East-Indies. But it was agreed, that the two companies should negotiate concerning their respective interests, as the king of Great-Britain could not dispose of the rights of the English East-India company without their consent. As to the restitution of the captures made before the war, they were positively refused.

The confidence and good humour of the two courts being thus subverted, all that followed was rather an altercation than a treaty. It is true, that papers passed backward and forward; and the pretensions of each party, the points they agreed to cede, and those which they were determined to adhere to, grew more distinct and explicit. But all that cordiality was vanished which is so necessary towards smoothing and clearing a road, which a long hostility had broken up, and so many intricate topics had contributed to embarrass.

Without involving ourselves in the detail of the several memorials which were delivered in, and without referring numerically to the several articles, it will be sufficient that we briefly state those points which were, or seemed to be, in a fair way of adjustment between England and France; and afterwards wards those on which it should appear that the negotiation broke off.

After some discussions concerning its proper limits, it was agreed, that all Canada should be ceded to the English. This cession comprehended, on one side, all the islands and countries adjoining to the gulph of St. Laurence. On the other, it took in all the great lakes, and the whole course of the Ohio, to its discharge into the Mississippi; a territory sufficient for the basis of a great empire.

In drawing this line of division, another question arose concerning the bounds of Louisiana, and the state of the intermediate Indian nations between the lakes and the Mississippi, who inhabit, or are rather scattered over an immense country, that lies along the back of the English colonies all the way from Pennsylvania to Georgia. It was therefore very proper that something definitive should be settled on this article, as it might otherwise easily be made productive of a new war. England proposed that all those nations should continue, under the protection of Great Britain, without saying any thing precise, as to the dominion of the soil.

France controverted this proposition; she on her part proposed to divide these nations; that those to the northward of the line drawn to ascertain the limits of Canada should be independent, under the protection of England, but that those, who were to the southward, should enjoy the same independence, under the protection of France. Nothing was perfectly settled in relation to this point; but it does not seem as if there could have been any material disagreement upon it, had the other matters in debate been adjusted to their mutual satisfaction.

The African contest seemed to have been attended with still less difficulty. The French consented to give up both Senegal and Goree, provided Anamaboo and Acra were guaranteed to them.

The important question of the fishery was likewise determined. The French gave up their claim to Cape-Breton and St. John's, and were satisfied to receive the little island of St. Pierre on the coast of Newfoundland; but even this they were to receive on conditions sufficiently humiliating. They were to erect no sort of fortification, nor to keep up any military establishment there. An English commissary was to reside on the island, in order to see that these stipulations were adhered to.

As to the rest, the French were to have the same privileges on the coast of Newfoundland, checked with the same restrictions, which before they had enjoyed under the fifteenth article of the treaty of Utrecht. In conformity to another article of that treaty, and in compensation for the privilege of the fishery, they consented that Dunkirk should be demolished.

Concerning the islands of Guadaloupe, Marigalante, Minorca, and Belleisle, no great controversy had subsisted from the beginning. It had all along been agreed, that these conquests should be reciprocally restored. Neither did the French scruple to adopt the proposal made by the English concerning the affairs of the East Indies, nor to make satisfactory declarations concerning Ostend and Nieupoort.

So many delicate and interesting points were settled, that it does not at first appear what it was that could have retarded the peace. A discussion of the separate interests of two powers only, that are in earnest to agree, may be settled without any very considerable difficulty. The hard and almost inextricable part of the knot, is that wherein the opposite concerns, and interests of allies intervene. There were two points upon which, if we may form a judgment from appearances, this negotiation unfortunately broke off. The first was upon the manner in which England and France might be at liberty to assist their respective allies; and on the restitution of Wesel, Gueldres, and such other places as the French had conquered from his Prussian majesty.

With regard to the former, the repeated proposals of France for a neutrality in Germany had been uniformly and positively rejected by the British administration. They considered therefore these offers as so many attacks upon national integrity. And this scheme not being admitted, they could come to no agreement, and scarcely to an intelligible explanation either of the mode, or the quantity of the assistance which they should be at liberty mutually to send to their German allies, or of the place in which such succours should be employed. As to Wesel and Gueldres, the French obstinately refused to restore those places. They declared that such a cession would be directly against the faith by which they were bound to the empress queen of Hungary, for whom they insisted that these places had been conquered, and in whose name alone they were governed, though they had been reduced by the French arms, and were at that moment held by French garrisons.

As to the second point, namely, the restitution of the captures made previous to the declaration of war, the negotiating powers were equally positive, the one to demand, the other to refuse it. The English argued, that this claim had no foundation in the law of nations, neither was it grounded on any particular convention. That the right of all hostile operations results, not from a formal declaration of war, but from the hostilities which the aggressor had first offered; that the contrary of this proposition is at least contestible; and since it can by no means be clearly established, it follows, that the detainment of those captures must be considered on the side of England, as part of the "uti possidetis," originally proposed as the basis of this treaty.

France, on the other hand, seemed as fully convinced of the justice of her pretensions, and considered the arguments with which she supported them to be so unanswerable, that she offered to submit them to the justice of the English tribunals. They urged that this claim of restitution was founded on the law of nations, and upon particular conventions, by the nineteenth article of the peace of Utrecht, and by the second article of the treaty of commerce; and that this was strengthened by the third article of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, which renewed and confirmed those articles in the preceding treaties.

By these articles a protection is allowed to the respective subjects which may have ships in the ports of either of the powers, because having no opportunity of knowing that a rupture has happened, pened, they sailed under the security of peace, and the faith of treaties. By a parity of reasoning, the ships not actually in those ports ought to enjoy the same security; else, as they are included in the same parity of circumstances, it would follow, contrary to the principles of humanity and right reason, that the sovereigns had provided for the preservation of one part of their subjects from the miseries of a sudden rupture, to which they expose the rest. The particular conventions of these treaties, they said, had their foundation in general equity, and the law of nations; since, as it is impracticable for belligerent states to agree amongst themselves which is the aggressor, it is proper that the subjects should receive previous notice of the rupture, in order that they might be able distinctly to know when they are, or are not in security, or when they may, or may not rely upon the treaties which subsist between their sovereigns.

These topics were, as usual, debated with great heat and little effect; and as in such discussions the arguments on both sides are plausible, and there can be no authorized judge, the weight of the several pretensions commonly depends upon the power of the parties to enforce them. On these two points, therefore, the renunciation of German alliances, and the restitution of captures, the negotiation from the beginning was at a stand: and on those at length, to all appearance, it finally broke off.

We are, however, fully satisfied that the disagreement even in those points might have been only the pretended cause of the rupture. The true cause of the breach seems to have been the unreasonable interposition of the Spanish claims: for could France be supposed in good earnest to desire peace, that is, to desire such a reasonable peace as her circumstances might demand, when she officiously mingled with a particular debate, the affairs of a foreign and neutral power, which had not the smallest connection with those that were then properly under deliberation? It was ridiculous to urge, that this was done from a prudent foresight, and to prevent a future war, which those disputes might possibly have occasioned. The business was to put an end to the war which then actually subsisted; and nothing could be farther from assisting this design than to increase the subjects of debate. France must have been sensible of the weight of this argument, proposed in the very beginning of this treaty, as a necessary precaution for carrying it on with effect, that their particular dispute should be separated from those of their German Allies, with which it certainly had a more natural connection than with those that subsisted between England and Spain; as all the former parties were then engaged directly or indirectly in the war, to which Spain had then no manner of relation.

The English ministry finding the French immovable on the two capital points above-mentioned, and having no opinion of the sincerity of their proceedings, sent directions to Mr. Stanly to return to England, and to desire that M. Bussy should, on the part of his court, receive the same orders: accordingly on the twentieth of September, an end was put to this negotiation; which being thus broken off, that proposed at Augsburg never took place.

As nothing could have been more unprecedented, so nothing was more alarming than the proceeding of the court of Spain in the negotiation. It was altogether extraordinary to see a proposal for accommodating disputes that subsisted between friends, coming through the channel of an enemy. It was extremely singular to see points of such consequence formally communicated and proposed for deliberation by a French agent, commissioned only to negotiate a particular and distinct business, when the Spaniards had an ambassador residing in London, from whom no sort of intimation had been previously received of such a design.

That proposal not only marked out a want of sincerity on the part of France, but it manifested so strange and irregular a partiality on the part of Spain, that it would very little have become the dignity of the king of Great-Britain, or his attention to the safety of his subjects, to let it pass without a full and satisfactory explanation. Accordingly the Spanish ambassador was called upon to disavow this irregular procedure; but he returned a verbal, and soon after was authorised by his court to return a written answer, in which he openly avowed and justified the step taken by the French agent, as entirely agreeable to the sentiments of his master. He declared that the kings of France and Spain were united not only by the ties of blood, but by a mutual interest. He applauded the humanity and greatness of mind which his most Christian majesty demonstrated in the proposition that was complained of. He insisted much on the sincere desire of peace, the only motive which influenced the conduct of the two monarchs; and he added, haughtily, that if his master had been governed by any other principles, "his Catholic majesty, giving full scope to his greatness, would have spoken for himself, and as became his dignity."

It appeared evidently from the whole of this paper, that the court of Spain was regularly, as a sort of party, apprised of every step that was taken in the negotiation; that her judgment was appealed to upon every point, and her authority called in aid to force the acceptance of the terms which were offered by France; in a word, that there was a perfect union of affections, interests, and councils between those two courts; and the minister of the former, so far from denying or palliating this conduct, seemed to glory in it.

Mr. Pitt, who then took the lead in the ministry, was fully satisfied the intentions of Spain were by no means equivocal, and that this partiality, which they strongly avowed, not only by declarations, but by facts, would drive them into all the measures of France. That a war on that account was absolutely inevitable; and if, for the present moment, the Spaniards rather delayed their declaration of war, than laid aside their hostile intentions, it was in order to strike the blow at their own time, and with the greatest effect; that therefore their reasons for delaying to act were the very motives, which ought to induce us to act with the utmost speed and vigour. That we ought to consider the evasions of that court as a refusal of satisfaction, and that refusal as a declaration of war. That we ought from prudence, as well as from spirit, to secure to ourselves the first blow: and to be practically convinced, that the early and effective measures, which had so large a share in reducing cing France to the dependance upon Spain, would also be the fittest for deterring or disabling Spain from affording any protection to France. That, to carry on this war with vigour, it was only necessary to continue our present efforts; no new armament would be necessary; and that, if any war could provide its own resources, it must be a war with Spain. That their fleet had not yet arrived, and that the taking of it would at once disable theirs and strengthen our hands. This procedure so suited to the dignity of the nation, and the insults it had received, would be a lesson to Spain, and to every other power, how they should presume to dictate in our affairs, and to intermeddle with a menacing mediation, and an officiousness as insidious as it was audacious. That we would allow our enemies, whether secret or declared, no time to think and recollect themselves.

These sentiments, so agreeable to the resolute and enterprising character of this minister, appeared shocking to almost all the rest of his colleagues. They admitted that we ought not to be terrified from the assertion of our just demands, by the menaces of any power. They owned that Spain had taken a very extraordinary and very unjustifiable step, but that we ought to admit, and even to wish for, an explanation. This court, upon a sober, yet spirited remonstrance, might recal that rash proposition into which they had been perhaps unwarily seduced by the artifices of France; that to shun war upon a just occasion was cowardice, but to provoke or court it, was madness. And, if to court a war was not in general a very wise measure, to desire it with Spain, if possibly it could be avoided, was to overturn the most fundamental principles of the policy of both nations. That this desire of adding war to war, and enemy to enemy, whilst we had our hands already as full as they could hold, and whilst all our faculties were strained to the utmost pitch, was to over-calculate the national strength of our country, which, however great, had its limits, and was not able to contend with all the world: that whilst we were calling for new enemies, no mention was made of new allies, nor indeed of any new resource whatsoever. To plunge into such measures, in the manner proposed, and upon no better grounds, could not fail to scandalize and to alarm all Europe; and we could possibly derive no advantage from this precipitate conduct, which would not be more than counterbalanced by the jealousy and terror it would necessarily create in every nation near us. As to the seizure of the fleet, it was not to be depended upon, as at the very time of that deliberation, it might be expected to be safe in its harbour; and perhaps if we could succeed in seizing it, we might perform a service not very agreeable to neutral nations, and as little advantageous to our own commerce.

If Spain, blind to her true interests, and misled by French councils, should give in a more decisive manner into the designs of that court, and obstinately refuse a reasonable satisfaction, it would be then true time to declare war, when all the neighbouring and impartial powers were convinced that we acted with as much temper as resolution, and when every thinking man at home would be satisfied that we were not hurried into the hazards and expences of war, from an idea of chimerical heroism, but from inevitable necessity; and that in such a case, we might depend upon the utmost support which the nation could give to an administration that depended upon its strength, and yet dreaded to waste it wantonly, or to employ it unjustly. The minister, warmed by this opposition, declared that, "this was the time for humbling the whole house of Bourbon; that if this opportunity were let slip, it might never be recovered; and if he could not prevail in this instance, he was resolved that this was the last time he should sit in that council. He thanked the ministers of the late king for their support; said he was himself called to the ministry by the voice of the people, to whom he considered himself as accountable for his conduct; and that he would no longer remain in a situation which made him responsible for measures he was no longer allowed to guide."

On the division, the minister himself, and a noble lord closely connected with him, were the only voices, in favour of the immediate declaration of war; the rest of the board were unanimously against it.

Mr Pitt and lord Temple, adhering to their first opinion, and having declared their reasons in writing, resigned their employments. This resignation seemed equal to a revolution in the state. An universal alarm was spread; a thousand rumours flew abroad, and the first suggestions were that this great minister, endeavouring to avail himself by his firmness in negotiation of the advantages he had acquired by his vigour in war, was opposed by the whole council, who were resolved to have a peace at any rate, and that this opposition had driven him to resign the seals. But the true cause of the resignation very soon came out; and on this point a violent conflict ensued, in which the popular cause was worst sustained, and the ministerial better, that is with greater effect, than is usual in such discussions. Some circumstances contributed not a little to this success.

When Mr. Pitt resigned the seals, the great person to whom they were delivered, received them with ease and firmness, without requesting that he should resume his office. His majesty expressed his concern for the loss of so able a servant; and to shew the favourable sense he entertained of his services, he made him a most gracious and unlimited offer of any rewards in the power of the crown to bestow. His majesty at the same time expressed himself not only satisfied with the opinion of the majority of his council, but declared he should have found himself under the greatest difficulty how to have acted, had that council concurred as fully in supporting the measure proposed by Mr. Pitt, as they had done in rejecting it: a sentiment (in the light in which his majesty considered this measure) grounded upon the firmest principles of integrity and honour, and which must raise the highest veneration for his royal character, not only among his own subjects, but amongst all nations, when they see a power which has so little to fear from any human effort, so very fearful of the least infringement of the strictest and most critical rules of justice.

Mr. Pitt was sensibly touched with the grandeur and condescension of this proceeding. "I confess, Sire, said he, I had but too much reason to expect your majesty's displeasure. I did not come prepared pared for this exceeding goodness. Pardon me, Sire, it overpowers, it oppresses me!" He then burst into tears.

We are far from an attempt to add any colouring to so exquisitely affecting a picture. We are indeed far from being able to do justice to perhaps one of the most pathetic and elevated scenes which could possibly be displayed, the parting of such a prince and such a minister.

The next day a pension of three thousand pounds a year was settled on Mr. Pitt for three lives, and at the same time a title was conferred upon his lady and her issue; a pension the best bestowed, and a nobility the most honourably acquired, and most truly merited. Immediately the gazette gave notice to the public of all these transactions. The resignation made the first article, the honours and rewards the next; and they were followed by a letter from the English ambassador in Spain, containing an account of the favourable and pacific language of that court, and of the strong assurance they gave of a desire to accommodate all differences in an amicable manner.

Without presuming to take any part in a controversy which long divided the royal council, or without entering into the sentiments of any faction, which we have always avoided, we may affirm with truth and impartiality, that no man was ever better fitted than Mr. Pitt, to be the minister in a great and powerful nation, or better qualified to carry that power and greatness to their utmost height. There was in all his designs a magnitude, and even a vastness, which was not easily comprehended by every mind, and which nothing but success could have demonstrated to be reasonable. If he was sometimes incorrect, he was never vulgar.

This power, as it was not acquired, so neither was it exercised in an ordinary manner. With very little parliamentary, and with less court influence, he swayed both at the council board and in parliament with an authority unknown before to the best supported ministers. He was called to the ministry by the voice of the people; and what is more rare, he held it with that approbation; and under him for the first time, administration and popularity were seen united. Under him Great Britain carried on the most important war in which she was ever engaged, alone and unassisted, with greater splendor, and with more success than she had ever enjoyed at the head of the most powerful alliances. Alone this island seemed to balance the rest of Europe.

In the conduct of the war he never suffered the enemy to breathe, but overwhelmed them with reiterated blows, and kept up the alarm in every quarter. If one of his expeditions was not so well calculated, or so successfully executed, amends were made by another, and by a third. The spirit of the nation, once roused, was not suffered for a moment to subside; and the French, dazzled as it were by the multitude and celerity of his enterprises, seemed to have lost all power of resistance. In short, he revived the military genius of the English; he supported our allies; he extended our trade; he raised our reputation; he augmented our dominions; and on his departure from the administration, left the nation in no other danger than that which ever must attend exorbitant power, and the temptation which induces the invidious exertion of it. Happy had it been for him, for his sovereign, and his country, if a temper less austere, and a disposition more compliant and conciliating, had been joined to his other great virtues. The want of those qualities disabled him from acting any otherwise than alone: it prevented our enjoying the joint fruit of the wisdom of many able men, who might mutually have tempered, and mutually forwarded each other; and finally, which was not the least loss, it deprived us of his own immediate services.

I now proceed to particularize the most remarkable events that happened in Great-Britain during the course of this year.

The new tax laid upon beer, excited loud clamours among the class of labouring people, especially in the metropolis, where some few publicans began to raise the price, in consequence of this imposition: but, as they did not act in concert, those houses, in which the attempt was made, were immediately abandoned by their customers. Menacing letters and intimations were sent to some individuals, supposed to have advised the new duty. The streets resounded with the noise of vulgar clamour and discontent; nor was it till after some time, and many experiments, that the price of strong beer could be actually raised to the consumer.

The establishment of a militia, though at first projected in compliance with the earnest request of the people, was not, however, entirely accomplished, without exciting some dangerous commotions. As this kind of troops had already served the term of three years, prescribed by law, it was necessary to ballot for a succession of men; and in the month of March the justices of the peace in the county of Northumberland were assembled at Hexham for this purpose. The common people being determined to oppose this regulation, which they considered as an intolerable grievance, assembled to the number of five thousand of both sexes, and of all ages, some of them armed with clubs, and some of them with fire-arms. The justices, apprehensive of some such disorder, had procured a battalion of the Yorkshire militia for their guard, and these were drawn up in the marketplace. The populace being joined by a body of desperate keelmen from Newcastle, began to insult the guard with reproaches, missiles, and even with blows, which the militia for some time bore with all the patience that could be imagined. The riot act was read, and the people were exhorted to retire to their respective habitations. But instead of complying with this advice, they became more untractable. Encouraged by the forbearance of the militia, and possessed with a notion that they would not commit hostilities, they proceeded from one act of outrage to another; assaulted them as they stood arranged in order of battle, and killed an officer and two private men. Thus exasperated, the militia poured in upon them a regular discharge, by which forty-five were killed on the spot, and three hundred miserably wounded. The survivors immediately betook themselves to flight, and many dropped down upon the road in their retreat. The most lamentable part of this disaster was a circumstance which attends all such unfortunate occasions: some hapless women and children, drawn thither by curiosity, or the more laudable motive motive of persuading their husbands, parents, or kinsmen to retire, were confounded and perished in the undistinguishing vengeance of the day. Some of the rioters, being apprehended, were tried for high treason, convicted, condemned, and executed for examples.

The spirit of murder and assassination still continued to prevail in different parts of the kingdom. Women attempted the lives of their husbands, and husbands embued their hands in the blood of their wives. As the last year was distinguished by an atrocious murder committed in London by a foreigner, so the present exhibited an instance of the same kind, perpetrated by another stranger in the capital, though attended with much more savage and horrible circumstances. One Theodore Gardelle, a Swiss painter, being provoked by some trivial injury, layed violent hands on Mrs. King, in whose house he lodged, near Leicester Square, and deprived her of life in her own apartment. The rage of passion, which prompted him to this excess, was succeeded by a transport of terror, which hurried him into such measures for his own preservation, as cannot fail to shock the humane and tender reader. He concealed what had passed by locking the apartment where the body lay, and by dismissing the maid servant, who happened to be absent when the murder was committed. He had sent her upon some errand to a different part of the town, as if the murder had been a premeditated scheme: when she returned, he told her Mrs. King was gone suddenly to the country, and had directed him to dismiss her from her service. He accordingly payed her the wages that were due to her, in consequence of which she retired.

Being now in possession of the house, he passed the night alone in his own apartment. Next morning he descended to the chamber where the body of the unhappy woman lay, separated the head, and even dissected it with the most gloomy deliberation. This he consumed by fire: the bowels he took out, and buried in the soil of the privy. He then dismembered the body, and destroyed the limbs with a fire made of green wood, that the smell of flesh might not alarm the neighbours. He divided the trunk in small pieces, and carrying part of them in a sack, threw them into the river. This was a work of time, which he seemed to brood over with a kind of horrid enjoyment. In the intervals of his labour, he solaced himself with the conversation of a prostitute, who lay with him in the house, and from whose side he rose early in the morning in order to finish his dreadful task.

His guilt could not be long concealed. The sudden disappearance of Mrs. King, and the distracted behaviour of the assassin, created suspicion. He found it necessary to employ an occasional domestic, who perceived signs of blood. The servant, whom he had dismissed, exerted herself in his detection: a warrant was granted for apprehending Gardelle; and search being made in the house, parcels of the body were found. The murderer, being brought to trial, was convicted on the fullest evidence, and executed in the open street, not far from the place where the crime was committed.

I shall conclude this narrative of domestic transactions with an account of the marriage and coronation of their present majesties.

The king, ever attentive to the great purposes of his elevation, and desirous of giving all possible permanency to the present happy establishment, resolved to choose a consort, whose participation might sweeten the cares of government, and whose virtues should make his private happiness coincide with the satisfaction of his people. Struck with the character of the princess Charlotta-Sophia, princess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz *, he privately employed persons, in whom he could confide, to ascertain the report of her engaging qualifications; and being fully convinced of her personal attractions, her amiable disposition, and superior understanding, he made a formal demand of her in marriage. The proposal of such an illustrious alliance could not but be acceptable to the court of Mecklenburg; and the princess herself was not insensible to the extraordinary accomplishments of the young monarch, who had thus distinguished her by his affection and esteem.

On the eighth of July, the members of the privy council being assembled to a very considerable number, the king acquainted them in a formal speech, that, "having nothing so much at heart as to procure the welfare and happiness of his people, and to render the same stable and permanent to posterity, he had, ever since his accession to the throne, turned his thoughts towards the choice of a princess for his consort; and now, with great satisfaction, acquainted them, that, after the fullest information, and mature deliberation, he had come to a resolution to demand in marriage the princess Charlotta of Mecklenburg-Strelitz; a princess distinguished by every eminent virtue, and amiable endowment; whose illustrious line had constantly shewn the firmest zeal for the Protestant religion, and a particular attachment to his family: that he had judged it proper to communicate to them these his intentions, that they might be fully apprized of a matter so highly important to him and to his kingdoms, and which he persuaded himself would be most acceptable to all his loving subjects."

This declaration was so agreeable to the council, that they unanimously requested it might be made public for the satisfaction of the nation in general. The earl of Harcourt was appointed ambassador-plenipotentiary to the court of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, to demand the princess, and sign the contract of marriage; and the royal yachts were prepared, under convoy of a gallant squadron commanded by lord Anson, to convoy the future queen to England. Meanwhile her household being established, the ambassador set out for the continent on this important affair. The dutchesses of Ancafter and Hamilton and the countess of Effingham were appointed ladies of the bed-chamber, to attend her from the court of Mecklenburg in her passage to England; and embarking at Harwich, the whole fleet set sail for Stade on the eighth day

* The duchy of Mecklenburg lies between Lunenburg and the Baltick, and is neither rich nor extensive. The dukes are said to be descended from the kings of the Vandals. The people were converted to the Christian religion in the twelfth century, and at present profess the Lutheran persuasion. The duke of Mecklenburg-Swerin, being the eldest branch, possesses a yearly revenue amounting to about forty thousand pounds. The duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz does not receive above twenty thousand pounds a-year; but he has a voice in the diet of the empire. The princess Charlotta-Sophia, who was then in the seventeenth year of her age, is sister to the last mentioned prince, born of Elizabeth, daughter of Ernest-Frederick, duke of Saxe Hildburghausen.

of August. The contract of marriage being signed by the earl of Harcourt at Strelitz, her royal highness was complimented by the states of the country, and the deputies of the towns. The ambassador and the ladies were magnificently entertained; and the event was celebrated with the most splendid rejoicings.

On the seventeenth day of the month, the princess, accompanied by the reigning duke her brother, set out for Mirow, amidst the tears and prayers of all ranks of people, the poor in particular, whose zealous patroness she had always shewn herself. Next day she arrived at Perleberg, where the count de Gotter complimented her in the name of the Prussian monarch. From thence she continued her journey by Leutzen to Gourde, and on the twenty-second reached Stade, under a general discharge of cannon, and amidst the acclamations of the people. She was received by all the burgesses in arms: the whole town was illuminated: triumphal arches were erected; several of the principal ladies presented her with verses on her approaching nuptials; and the public joy was expressed by every possible demonstration. On the twenty-third she embarked in the yacht at Cuxhaven, where she was saluted by the British squadron assembled for her convoy. The moment she entered the cabin, she saluted the officers of the different ships, who had crowded the deck in order to have the pleasure of seeing her, and were all charmed with her polite and easy behaviour.

In this interval the minds of the English people were wound up to the highest pitch of expectation. The king having signified his intention that the princess should land at Greenwich, both sides of the Thames were for several days lined with innumerable multitudes. The river itself was covered with pleasure-boats, wherries, and other vessels filled with spectators, and cruising between Blackwall and Gravesend, in order to meet and welcome their future queen's arrival. Seats and scaffolds were prepared along the shore for several miles; and all the publicans residing near the banks of the river, both in Kent and Essex, were enriched by an amazing conflux of company. Every individual observed the wind as earnestly as if his whole fortune had depended upon the first change of weather; and London poured forth her swarms like an immense hive during the first gleams of vernal sunshine. All the medicinal wells, to which wealthy people resort in the summer, either for health or pleasure, were now deserted; and numbers flocked to the metropolis from all parts of the united kingdom to see their sovereign's bride, and be eye-witnesses of the ensuing coronation. After a tedious voyage of ten days, during which the fleet was exposed to three different storms, and often in danger of being driven on the coast of Norway, the princess landed on the seventh day of September in the afternoon at Harwich, where she was received by the mayor and aldermen in their formalities. She advanced with her attendants by the way of Colchester to Witham, and lodged at a house belonging to the earl of Abercorn, where she gratified the curiosity of the people with the most obliging condescension. Meanwhile the king, whose ardour far surpassed the impatience of his subjects, being apprized by couriers of her arrival, dispatched his own coaches, with a party of the horse-guards, who met her at Rumford, and conducted her to London, through innumerable crouds of people, assembled on the road to gratify their curiosity and welcome her arrival. Their applause was signified in tumultuous acclamations, which attended her for several miles; and the eagerness of the populace was even carried to a degree of licentious zeal, which the guards could hardly restrain within the bounds of decent respect.

Thus accompanied by great numbers in carriages, on horseback and a-foot, this amiable princess proceeded by Shoreditch church, up Old-street to the city-road, across Islington, along the new road into Hyde-park, and down Constitution-hill, to the garden gate of the palace of St. James's, where she was handed out of her coach by the duke of Devonshire, in quality of lord-chamberlain. At the gate she was received by the duke of York, and in the garden she was met by the king himself, whose looks declared the transports of his joy. When she made her obeisance, he raised her by the hand, which he kissed, and then led her up stairs to the palace, where they dined together, with the whole royal family. At nine the nuptial ceremony was performed by the archbishop of Canterbury in the royal chapel, which had been magnificently decorated for the occasion. Besides the royal family, all the great officers of state, the nobility, peers and peeresses, and the foreign ministers, attended at the service, the conclusion of which was announced to the people by the discharge of the artillery at the Park and the Tower; and the cities of London and Westminster were illuminated in honour of this auspicious event. Nothing was now seen at court but splendor and festivity, exhibiting all the marks of mirth and satisfaction. The great accession of domestic happiness that the king enjoyed in this connection, enabled him to support the fatigue of receiving fresh addresses of felicitation, which were ushered in as usual by the city of London, and presented to him by the clergy, the universities, the dissenters, the cities, towns, and corporations in all parts of the British dominions.

The ceremony of the nuptials was soon succeeded by that of the coronation, which could not fail of being extremely irksome and disagreeable to a prince of true taste and sentiment. A commission had long ago passed the seal, constituting a court to decide the pretensions of a great number of people, who laid claim to several offices and privileges, in the celebration of this necessary form; and many of these, being derived from the most remote antiquity, carried with them an uncouth and ridiculous appearance to a modern reader. Westminster-hall was prepared for the coronation-banquet, by removing the courts of judicature, boarding the floor, erecting canopies, and building three rows of galleries for the accommodation of spectators. A platform was laid between this Hall and the Abbey-church, where the king is actually crowned. All the houses and streets within sight of the procession were faced and crowded with benches and scaffolding, which extended on both sides within the Abbey from the Western entrance almost up to the choir. The prospect formed by these occasional erections, which were surprisingly calculated for security and convenience, could not fail to awaken the expectation of the spectator for something solemn and sublime: but when all these benches were filled with above two hundred thousand people, of both sexes, arrayed in gay apparel, they filled the mind with an astonishing idea of the wealth and populousity of Great Britain, and entirely eclipsed the procession, notwithstanding the incredible profusion of jewels and finery, and all the other circumstances of pomp by which it was distinguished. The principal objects, however, still maintained their importance in the eyes and bosoms of all the spectators, who could not without the most lively emotions of admiration and joy behold such attractive accomplishments in the royal pair, whose virtues adorned the crowns they were destined to wear.

The ostentation of this year was closed with the anniversary pageants that celebrate the election of a new lord mayor in the city of London. As the kings and queens of Great-Britain are always entertained at Guildhall by the magistrate who happens to be chosen in the year of the coronation, extraordinary preparations were made for the reception of their majesties; who, with a great number of the nobility, honoured the banquet, in the midst of the most tumultuous expressions of loyalty and attachment that ever were known on any former occasion.

On the third of November the new parliament was opened at Westminster; and, as no ministerial influence had been used in electing the members of which it was composed, it undoubtedly deserved the appellation of a free parliament; a phenomenon which had not appeared in the meridian of Great Britain for the space of above forty years before this period. The king, being seated on the throne, commanded the attendance of the commons; to whom he signified his pleasure, by the mouth of the high-lord-chancellor, that they should return to their house, and chuse a new speaker. Accordingly their unanimous choice fell upon Sir John Cust, baronet, a gentleman of extensive knowledge and distinguished probity, qualified in all respects to supply the room of Mr. Onslow, who had so long and so worthily discharged that important office. His majesty, repairing again to the house of peers on the sixth, approved of the speaker, and harangued the parliament in these words.

“ My Lords and Gentlemen,

“ At the opening of the first parliament, summoned and elected under my authority, I with pleasure take notice of an event, which has made me completely happy, and given universal joy to my loving subjects. My marriage with a princess, eminently distinguished by every virtue, and amiable endowment, whilst it affords me all possible domestic comfort, cannot but highly contribute to the happiness of my kingdoms; which has been, and always shall be, my first object in every action of my life.

“ It has been my earnest wish that this first period of my reign might be marked with another felicity; the restoring of the blessings of peace to my people, and putting an end to the calamities of war, under which so great a part of Europe suffers. But though overtures were made to me, and my good brother and ally the king of Prussia, by the several belligerent powers, in order to a general pacification, for which purpose a congress was appointed; and propositions were made to me by France, for a particular peace with that crown, which were followed by an actual negotiation; yet that congress hath not hitherto taken place, and the negotiation with France is entirely broken off.

“ The sincerity of my disposition to effectuate this good work has been manifested in the progress of it; and I have the consolation to reflect, that the continuance of the war, and the farther effusion of Christian blood, to which it was the desire of my heart to put a stop, cannot with justice be imputed to me.

“ Our military operations have been in no degree suspended or delayed; and it has pleased God to grant us farther important successes, by the conquests of the islands of Belleisle and Dominique; and by the reduction of Pondicherry, which hath in a manner annihilated the French power in the East Indies. In other parts, where the enemy's numbers were greatly superior, their principal designs and projects have been generally disappointed, by a conduct which does the highest honour to the distinguished capacity of my general prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, and by the valour of my troops. The magnanimity and ability of the king of Prussia have eminently appeared in resisting such numerous armies, and surmounting so great difficulties.

“ In this situation, I am glad to have an opportunity of receiving the truest information of the sense of my people, by a new choice of their representatives. I am fully persuaded you will agree with me in opinion, that the steady exertion of our most vigorous efforts, in every part where the enemy may still be attacked with advantage, is the only means that can be productive of such a peace, as may with reason be expected from our successes. It is, therefore, my fixed resolution, with your concurrence and support, to carry on the war, in the most effectual manner, for the interest and advantage of my kingdoms; and to maintain, to the utmost of my power, the good faith and honour of my crown, by adhering firmly to the engagements entered into with my allies. In this I will persevere, until my enemies, moved by their own losses and distresses, and touched with the miseries of so many nations, shall yield to the equitable conditions of an honourable peace; in which case, as well as in the prosecution of the war, I do assure you, no consideration whatever shall make me depart from the true interests of these my kingdoms, and the honour and dignity of my crown.”

“ Gentlemen of the house of Commons,

“ I am heartily sorry, that the necessity of large supplies appears so clearly from what has already been mentioned. The proper estimates for the services of the ensuing year shall be laid before you; and I desire you to grant me such supplies, as may enable me to prosecute the war with vigour, and as your own welfare and security, in the present critical juncture, require, that we may happily put the last hand to this great work. Whatever you give shall be duly and faithfully applied.

“ I dare say your affectionate regard for me and the queen makes you go before me in what I am next to mention; the making an adequate and honourable provision for her support, in case she should should survive me. This is what not only her royal dignity, but her own merit calls for, and I earnestly recommend it to your consideration.

“ My Lords and Gentlemen,

“ I have such confidence in the zeal and good affections of this parliament, that I think it quite superfluous to use any exhortations to excite you to a right conduct. I will only add, that there never was a situation in which unanimity, firmness, and dispatch, were more necessary for the safety, honour, and true interest of Great Britain.”

These expressions of confidence and esteem, which flowed from the heart of a patriot king, met with the most cordial returns of gratitude and affection. The two houses unanimously resolved to address their sovereign in the warmest terms of zeal and attachment. The commons, having thanked him for this most gracious speech from the throne, presented their congratulations on the joyful and auspicious event of his nuptials, with a princess descended from an illustrious protestant line, distinguished by the most eminent graces and endowments, worthy to be the partner of a throne, by possessing every virtue by which it could be adorned. They expressed their deep sense of the affectionate regard he had manifested for his people, by consulting, on this important and interesting occasion, as on every other, the happiness of them and their posterity. They assured him, that with hearts full of gratitude for this signal instance of his royal attention to the welfare of his subjects, and thoroughly sensible of the exalted merit of his illustrious consort, his faithful commons would not fail to make such honourable and ample provision as might enable her to support her royal dignity with proper lustre, in case she should survive his majesty *; for the long continuance of whose life they should offer up their most ardent vows to Providence, without ceasing. They thanked his majesty for having expressed his concern for the prosperity of his people, in wishing to restore them the blessings of peace. They declared their admiration of that humanity so becoming the royal breast, which, amidst the successes of his own kingdoms, felt for the calamities of other nations. They professed themselves fully persuaded, that those beneficent dispositions which induced his majesty to propose a congress for a general pacification, and to engage in a negotiation with France for a particular peace, could not have failed of the desired effect, if the enemy, influenced by the same motives, had shewn the same good intentions, and would have complied with such conditions as were requisite for the accomplishment of that salutary work. They testified the most grateful acknowledgment of his majesty's vigilance and firmness, in not suffering the hopes and expectations of peace to produce the least suspense or relaxation in the exertion of his arms; and congratulated his majesty on those happy successes, which, under the good providence of God, they ascribed to the wisdom and vigour of his majesty's measures: to these they owed the reduction of Dominique, the conquest of Belleisle, achieved with so much reputation to the British arms, and the destruction of the enemy's power in the East Indies, by the acquisition of Pondicherry, their last remaining settlement of any strength in those countries. They observed, that the wise and able conduct of his serene highness prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, whereby he had successively defeated the projects of the enemy, and prevented their making that progress, which, from their superior numbers, they expected; together with that gracious approbation which his majesty had been pleased to express of the valour of his troops; could not but give the highest satisfaction to his faithful commons. They said, they saw with just admiration repeated proofs, in every campaign, of that unshaken resolution, and of those astonishing efforts, which alone could have enabled his majesty's great ally, the king of Prussia, to resist the numerous forces of his enemies. They assured him, he might depend upon their intire concurrence and support, in the most effectual prosecution of the war, for the interest and advantage of Great Britain; and in maintaining, to the utmost of their power, the good faith and honour of his majesty's crown, and the engagements entered into with his allies: and they declared themselves truly sensible, that the constant care and attention of his majesty to pursue the most vigorous measures, in every part, where any successful impression could still be made upon the enemy, were the only means to attain that desirable object, an honourable and lasting peace. They acknowledged with the deepest gratitude, that most endearing expression of his majesty's unbounded goodness and affection towards his native country, in the solemn declaration which he had been pleased to make, that, as well in the prosecution of the war as in the conclusion of the peace, no consideration whatever should induce him to depart from the true interests of his kingdoms, and from the honour and dignity of his crown. They gave him to understand, that his faithful commons would cheerfully grant such supplies as the nature and extent of the several services should be found to require, firmly relying on his majesty's wisdom and justice, that they would be applied with the strictest œconomy, and in such a manner as might most effectually answer the great ends for which they should be granted. They expressed their earnest desires, that this first parliament convened by his authority, might, by their conduct, give his majesty a happy proof of the zeal, the loyalty, and the affection of his people. They concluded with saying, that, sensible of the difficult crisis in which they were assembled, they were determined to concur, with the greatest firmness and unanimity, in whatever might contribute to the public welfare, might tend to defeat the views and expectations of their enemies, and convince the world, that there were no difficulties which his majesty's wisdom and perseverance, with the assistance of his parliament, could not surmount.

The supplies of the year, which amounted to eighteen millions, two hundred twenty nine thousand, one hundred thirty-five pounds, eighteen shillings and eleven-pence halfpenny, were just provided, when the public attention was called off to an incident of national importance. The king of Great Britain had directed the earl of Bristol, his ambassador at Madrid, to demand of the Spanish ministry an explanation of the late treaty concluded between the kings of France and Spain; and particularly to require a categorical declaration with respect to the part his catholic majesty intended to act in the disputes between the courts of London and Versailles. His instructions imported, that those questions should be put with all the delicacy which the nature of such demands could admit, that Spain should have no cause to complain that she was treated with want of decorum. The demands were made accordingly, with all imaginable demonstrations of respect; but as the answers given appeared evasive and unsatisfactory, he became more peremptory in his remonstrances; and at length plainly declared, that if the court of Spain should refuse a positive explanation whether the catholic king intended to ally himself with France against England, he should interpret the refusal into an aggression and declaration of war, and, in consequence, be obliged to retire from the court of Madrid. The Spanish monarch had already taken his measures in concert with the court of Versailles, and waited only for an opportunity to provoke Great-Britain into an immediate rupture. In answer therefore to this declaration, Mr. Wall, the Spanish Minister, replied, that such a step could only be suggested by the spirit of haughtiness and of discord, which, for the misfortune of mankind, still reigned but too much in the British government; that it was in that very moment the war was declared, and the king's dignity violently attacked; and the earl might retire how and when he should think proper. Nothing could be more idle and frivolous than this pretence for taking umbrage. Had the English Minister failed in point of punctilio, and made an abrupt demand, unauthorized by the law of nations, the court of Madrid might have resented his personal behaviour, and complained of it by their ambassador at London; but, even in that case, the affront would have been, by all the reasonable part of mankind, deemed too inconsiderable a cause for involving the two nations in the horrors and misery of war: yet even this plea was wanting. The Earl of Bristol proceeded with delicacy and caution, and did not insist upon a categorical answer until every milder method had been tried without success. The most extraordinary circumstance attending this rupture was the purport of a paper delivered to the earl of Egremont, who had succeeded Mr. Pitt as secretary of state for the southern department, by the count de Fuentes, the Spanish ambassador at the court of London. It seems to have been calculated for sowing jealousies and fomenting divisions among the subjects of Great-Britain, and may be termed, "His catholic majesty's declaration of war against the person of Mr. Pitt, late secretary of state, and minister to the king of Great-Britain."

No measures were now to be kept with Spain. The earl of Bristol was recalled: the count de Fuentes retired from England. His Britannic Majesty granted a commission, empowering the admiralty to issue letters of marque, and commissions for privateers to act against the subjects of Spain. War was declared in form on the fourth day of January; and on the nineteenth the king communicated it in a speech to both houses of parliament. He said he had so often assured them of his sincere disposition to put an end to the calamities of war, and to restore the public tranquility on solid and lasting foundations, that no impartial person, either at home or abroad, could suspect him of unnecessarily kindling a new war in Europe. He acquainted them, that, since their recess, he had found himself indispensably obliged to declare war against Spain, for the causes specified in his public declaration. He observed, that his own conduct, since his accession to the throne, as well as that of the late king his grandfather, towards Spain, had been so full of good will and friendship, so averse to the laying hold of several just grounds of complaint, which might have been alledged, and so attentive to the advantages of the catholic king and his family, that it was matter of the greatest surprise to find that engagements had, in this conjuncture, been entered into between that crown and France; and a treaty made to unite all the branches of the house of Bourbon in the most ambitious and dangerous designs against the commerce and independency of the rest of Europe, and particularly of these kingdoms. He expressed his reliance on the divine blessing on the justice of his cause, on the zealous and powerful assistance of his faithful subjects, and the concurrence of his allies, who must find themselves involved in the pernicious and extensive projects of his enemies. He left these considerations with his parliament, full of the justest confidence, that the honour of his crown, and the interests of his kingdoms, were safe in their hands.

This speech being taken into consideration, each house apart presented an address, containing assurances of constant support, conveyed in the most endearing expressions.

Here I must interrupt the narrative of parliamentary proceedings, to take notice of the reduction of the island of Martinique, which happened during this period.

The late minister had determined to employ a very considerable part of the force of the nation against the French colonies in the West-Indies, and a strong squadron was accordingly equipped. This armament sailed from Spithead in the month of October in the preceding year, having under their convoy a number of transports, with four battalions from Belleisle, to join at Barbadoes a strong body of forces from North America, together with some regiments and volunteers from Guadaloupe and the Leeward islands, and proceed in concert with the fleet already on that station, and make a conquest of Martinique, which, since the attempt of general Hopson, had been strengthened with new fortifications, and a strong body of troops. The militia were well regulated, commanded by experienced officers, and the island had plenty of provisions, artillery and ammunition.

It may be necessary to inform the reader, that Martinique is the largest of all the Caribbee islands, situated between the fourteenth and fifteenth degrees of north latitude, about the middle between Barbadoes and Guadaloupe, to the windward of Antigua and St. Christopher's. It extends twenty leagues in length, and may be about one hundred and thirty miles in circumference; indented by a great number of creeks and harbours, diversified with hill and dale, shaded with woods, watered by many streams; in climate sultry, in soil fertile, producing a very considerable quantity of sugar, indigo, coffee, cotton, ginger, aloes, and pimento. Here the governor-general of all the French islands in this part of the world resides; and here is established the sovereign council, whose jurisdiction extends over all the French Antilles, and even to the settlements of that crown in the islands of St. Domingo and Tortuga. In a word, Martinique is the most populous and flourishing of all the colonies which the French nation possess in the West-Indies. Its towns and harbours were strongly fortified: the country itself is almost inaccessible on account of woods, passes, rivers, rocks, and ravines; and was defended by a body of regular troops, reinforced by a disciplined militia, said to consist of ten thousand white natives; and to these might be added four times that number of negroes, whom they could arm in cases of necessity. The reduction of this island was an object of the greatest consequence to Great-Britain, not only on account of its intrinsic worth, and the detriment which the loss of it must occasion to the enemy, but likewise for the security of the English islands, amongst which it is situated, and of the British trading ships, which were constantly molested by the privateers of Martinico.
and

The armament from North America and England under the command of major-general Monckton and rear-admiral Rodney, amounting to eighteen battalions, and as many ships of the line, besides frigates, bombs, and fire-ships, having rendezvoused at Barbadoes in the month of December, proceeded from thence on the fifth day of January; and on the eighth the fleet and transports anchored in St. Ann's Bay, in the eastern part of Martinique, after the ships of war had silenced some batteries, which the enemy had erected on that part of the coast. In the course of this service, the Raisable, a ship of the line, was, by the ignorance of the pilot, run upon a reef of rocks, from whence she could not be disengaged, though the men were saved, together with her stores and artillery.

The general, however, judging this an improper place for a disembarkation, two brigades, commanded by the brigadiers Haviland and Grant, were detached under convoy to the bay of Petite-Anse, where a battery was cannonaded and taken by the seamen and marines. These brigades were soon followed by the whole army, and the rest of the squadron; and other batteries being silenced, general Monckton and the forces landed without further opposition on the sixteenth, in the neighbourhood of the Cas des Navires. The brigadiers Haviland and Grant had made a descent in the other place, and marched to the ground opposite to Pidgeon-island, which commands the harbour of Fort-Royal; but the road being found impassable for artillery, Mr. Monckton altered his first design. The two brigades, however, with the light infantry under lieutenant-colonel Scot, while they remained on shore, were attacked in the night by a body of grenadiers, freebooters, negroes, and Mulattoes, who had been transported from Fort-Royal; but they met with such a warm reception, as compelled them to retreat with precipitation, after having lost a great number of men.

The troops being landed at Cas des Navires, and reinforced with two battalions of marines, which were sent from the squadron, the general determined to besiege the town of Fort-royal; but, in order to make his approaches, he found it necessary to attack the heights of Garnier and Tortueson, which the enemy had fortified, and seemed resolved to defend to the last extremity. The English commander, having raised a battery to protect the passage of a ravine which separated him from those heights, made a disposition for the attack, which was put in execution on the twenty-fourth day of January. In the dawn of the morning, brigadier Grant, at the head of the grenadiers, sustained by lord Rollo's brigade, attacked the advanced posts of the enemy, under a brisk fire of the batteries; while brigadier Rufane, with his brigade, reinforced by the marines, marched up on the right to attack the redoubts that were raised along the shore; and the light infantry under colonel Scot, supported by the brigade of Walsh, advanced on the left of a plantation, in order, if possible, to turn the enemy.

They succeeded in their attempt, while the grenadiers were employed in driving the French from one post to another; and this motion contributed in a great measure to the success of the day. By nine in the morning they were in possession of the Morne Tortueson, and all the redoubts and batteries with which it was fortified. The enemy retired in confusion to the town of Fort Royal, and to the Morne Garnier, which being more high and inaccessible than the other, was deemed impregnable. During the contest for the possession of Tortueson, brigadier Haviland, at the head of his brigade, with two battalions of highlanders, and another corps of light infantry, under major Leland, was ordered to pass the ravine a good way to the left, and turn a body of the enemy posted on the opposite heights, in hope of being able to divide their forces; but the country was so difficult of access, that it was late before this passage was effected. In the mean time, the general, perceiving the enemy giving way on all sides, ordered colonel Scot's light infantry, with Walsh's brigade, and a division of the grenadiers, to advance on the left to a plantation, from whence they drove the enemy, and where they took possession of an advantageous post opposite to the Morne Garnier. They were sustained, on the right, by Haviland's corps, when they passed the ravine; and the road between the two plantations, which they occupied, was covered by the marines.

Next day the English began to erect batteries against the citadel of Fort-Royal: but were greatly harassed from Morne Garnier. On the twenty-seventh, about four in the afternoon, the enemy made a furious attack, with the greatest part of their forces, on the posts defended by the light infantry and brigadier Haviland; but met with so warm a reception, that they soon retired in disorder. Such was the ardour of the English troops, that they passed the ravine with the fugitives, seized their batteries, and took possession of the ground, being sustained by the brigade of Walsh, and the grenadiers under Grant, who marched up to their assistance when the attack began. Major Leland, with his light infantry, finding no resistance on the left, advanced to the redoubt which was abandoned; and the brigadiers Walsh, Grant, and Haviland, moved up in order to support him; so that by nine at night the British troops were in possession of this very strong post, that commanded the citadel, against which their own artillery was turned in the morning.

The French regular troops had fled into the town, and the militia dispersed in the country. The governor of the citadel, perceiving the English employed in erecting batteries on the different heights by which it was commanded, ordered the chamade to be beat, and surrendered by capitulation. On the fourth of February the gate of the citadel was delivered up to the English; and next morning the garrison, to the number of eight hundred, marched out with the honours of war. Immediately after the reduction of Fort Royal, deputations were sent from different quarters of the island, requesting a capitulation: but the governor-general, M. de la Touche, retired with his forces to St. Pierre, which he proposed to defend to the last extremity. On the seventh, Pidgeon island, which was strongly fortified, and esteemed one of the best defences of the harbour, surrendered at the first summons, and was favoured with a capitulation similar to that of the citadel. It was agreed, that the troops of the French king should be conveyed to Rochfort in France; that the militia should lay down their arms, and remain prisoners of war, until the fate of the island should be determined. This conquest was achieved at the small expence of about four hundred men, including a few officers, killed and wounded in the different attacks; but the loss of the enemy was much more considerable. The most remarkable circumstance of this enterprize was the surprising boldness and alacrity of the seamen, who, by force of arm, drew a number of heavy mortars and ships cannon up the steepest mountains to a considerable distance from the sea, and across the enemy's line of fire, to which they exposed themselves with undaunted resolution. Fourteen French privateers were found in the harbour of Port Royal; and a much greater number, from other parts in the island, were delivered up to admiral Rodney, in consequence of the capitulation with the inhabitants, who, in all other respects, were very favourably treated.

Just as general Monckton was going to set out for the reduction of St. Pierre, a very large and populous town, situated to the leeward of Fort-Royal, two deputies arrived with proposals of capitulation for the whole island on the part of M. de la Touche, the governor-general. On the fourteenth the terms were settled, and the capitulation signed: on the sixteenth the English commander took possession of St. Pierre, and all the posts in that neighbourhood; while the governor-general, with Mr. Rouille, the lieutenant-governor, the staff officers, and about three hundred and twenty grenadiers, were put on board some transports, to be carried to France. That such an important conquest should be achieved almost without bloodshed, was in a great measure owing to the favourable capitulation which the island of Guadaloupe had obtained, and the good faith with which the articles of that capitulation had been observed by the conquerors. Indeed the inhabitants of Martinico, who were indulged with nearly the same terms, must have found themselves considerable gainers by their change of sovereign; inasmuch as, together with the enjoyment of their own religion, laws, and property, they had now an opportunity of exporting their produce to advantage, and of being supplied with all necessaries from the dominions of Great Britain; whereas, before they fell under the English government, their commerce was almost entirely interrupted, and they were obliged to depend even for subsistence on the most precarious methods of supply. By the reduction of Martinico, the island of Antigua, St. Christopher's, and Nevis, together with the ships trading to these colonies, were perfectly secured against the depredations of the enemy; and Great Britain acquired an annual addition in commerce, at least to the amount of one million sterling.

The surrender of Martinique naturally drew on the surrender of all the dependent islands. Granada, a fertile island, and possessed of some good harbours, was given up without opposition. St. Lucia, and St. Vincent, the right to which had so long been objects of contention between the two nations, followed its example. The English were now the sole and undisturbed possessors of all the Caribbees, and held that chain of innumerable islands which forms an immense bow, extending from the eastern point of Hispaniola almost to the continent of South America. And though some of these islands are barren, none of them very large, and not many of them well inhabited, they boast of more trade than falls to the lot of many respectable kingdoms.

Before we proceed any further in relating the transactions of the present campaign, it may not be improper to take notice of some other particulars which distinguished this session of parliament.

In the course of the foregoing year it had been found necessary to lay an additional duty of three shillings on every barrel of beer; and as this did not immediately take place, it made little impression on the minds of the people: but now that the brewers began to raise the price of their liquor, and the publicans in consequence resolved to demand one halfpenny extraordinary on every quart of strong beer, the cities of London and Westminster were filled with tumult. The populace denounced vengeance against the brewers for exacting a higher price than usual from the victuallers; and even threatened to pull down the houses of those publicans who should charge the additional halfpenny on their beer. Under the apprehension of these dangers, they petitioned the house of commons for security and relief: and a new law was made in their favour. It enacted, that no brewer or retailer of strong beer or ale should be liable to be sued, impleaded, or molested, by indictment, information, popular action, or otherwise, for advancing the price; and that, on the other hand, they should not be allowed to mix it, on any pretence whatsoever, after the gauge of it should be taken by an officer of the excise.

Another act was passed to explain, amend, and reduce into one act, the several laws relating to the militia, which had been found hitherto ineffectual. By this regulation persons liable to serve in the militia, may be chosen by ballot, as before; or otherwise the parish officers, with the consent of the inhabitants, may provide volunteers, to be approved of by two deputy-lieutenants and one justice of the peace; and whatever expence they incur, by providing such volunteers, they are empowered to reimburse themselves by a rate on the parish, to be made in proportion to that for the relief of their poor, and the overplus, if any, to go in aid to the poors rate. It is further decreed, that parish officers shall pay to every person chosen by lot, and sworn in, or substitute, such sum of money, not exceeding five pounds, as any two deputy-lieutenants and a justice of the peace shall adjudge to be one half of the current price then paid for a volunteer in the county where such person shall be chosen. It is likewise ordained, that no person under the age of eighteen, or above forty-five, articulated clerk, apprentice, or poor man with three children born in wedlock, shall be compelled to serve: and that every person, who shall contract or agree with any other liable to serve, to insure him from serving in the militia, by providing a substitute, or paying the penalty of ten pounds, shall, for so doing, be fined in the sum of one hundred pounds, one half to the prosecutor, the other to the poor of the parish. This act was to take place from the time of its being passed, and is to continue in force for the space of seven years, and from thence to the end of the next session of parliament, and no longer. And nothing in the said act is to be construed to extend to the preventing persons of the same parish, town, or place, from entering into subscriptions among themselves, for paying jointly for any substitute or substitutes, who may be provided for one or more of the subscribers, who may happen to be chosen by lot. By this wise and wholesome alteration in the militia-laws, which obliges, and very justly, every man to pay his quota, all parishes have it in their power to keep their good and useful hands at home, and by a small and equitable tax, to be raised only twice in seven years, to send the idle and dissolute to serve their king and country for three years in the militia.

By a new law for the preservation of the game, it was decreed, that after the first day of June next ensuing, no partridge, pheasant, heath-fowl, or grouse, should be killed, taken, or sold, any year, between the twelfth day of February and first of September, for partridges; between the first of February and the first of October, for pheasants; between the first of January and the twentieth of August, for heath-fowl, commonly called black game; and between the first of December and the twenty-fifth day of July, for the grouse, commonly called the red game.—The person offending against this law to forfeit five pounds for every bird, to the prosecutor. A new act passed for the better lighting and paving the streets of Westminster, which were neither very safe nor commodious. A new law was also made for securing the additional salaries to the puisne judges, whom the king had rendered independent, in the course of the preceding session; and by another bill, an annuity of three thousand pounds was settled and secured for the use of Arthur Onslow, Esq; late speaker of the house of commons.

The mutiny bill was passed as an annual regulation; and the parliament enacted an explanatory law for a further encouragement to those who should make any progress towards the discovery of a certain method for finding out the longitude at sea, that great desideratum in the art of navigation. Mr. Harrison, a clock maker of London, had contrived a curious time-piece, which, under the direction of his son, was tried in a voyage to the West-Indies, and found to succeed in all experiments infinitely beyond any thing which had hitherto been invented on the same subject. Mr. Irwin, a native of Ireland, had also contrived a marine chair, by means of which it was found practicable, in the roughest weather at sea, to take observations of the immersions and emersions of Jupiter's satellites, from which the longitude may be ascertained. This machine had been found successful upon trial; and a board of longitude being now held at the Admiralty, to consider the merit of these improvements, Mr. Harrison and his son were gratified with a reward of fifteen hundred pounds; and five hundred were given to Mr. Irwin.

The public business being finished, the king repaired to the house of lords on the second day of June, and put an end to the session with a speech, in which he expressed the highest approbation of the zeal, unanimity and dispatch, which had so signally appeared in the course of their proceedings. He said, he had informed them at the opening of the session, that it had been his earnest wish to restore the blessings of peace to his people; but that it was his firm resolution, with their concurrence and support, to carry on the war in the most effectual manner, till that desirable object could be obtained upon equitable and honourable terms: that his sentiments in both these respects continued invariably the same, and he had the satisfaction to find them confirmed by the unanimous voice of his parliament. He observed, that the signal success of his arms, in the conquest of Martinique, and the acquisition of many other valuable settlements in the West-Indies, had, under the blessing of God, been the happy consequences of these measures. He expressed his trust in the divine providence, that they would be attended with still further advantages, until the enemy should be disposed to such terms of accommodation, as the dignity and just rights of his crown, and the future security and commercial interests of his subjects would permit him to accept. He said, when he considered the ample supplies which they had so unanimously granted, he could not but lament the heavy burthens, which the necessities of the public service had obliged them to impose upon his people: that, from these considerations, he had endeavoured, in every instance, to confine his demands within as narrow bounds, as the difficulties, in which he found himself involved, would allow: and that, from the same motive, his utmost care should be employed in observing the most exact œconomy, consistent with the safety of his kingdom, and the good faith and honour of his crown. He returned them his particular thanks for the proof, which they had given, of their regard to him and his family, in the ample provision they had made for the queen; whose virtues and affections to this country would, he was confident, be found to deserve it. He added, he had the fullest persuasion, that they would continue to diffuse, in their several counties, the spirit of concord, which they had themselves so steadily exerted in parliament: and he assured them, that he would, on his part, return their zeal and affection for his person and government, ment, by a constant attention to whatever might contribute to the ease of his subjects; and that it was his ardent wish to found the glories of his reign on the union of his parliaments, and on the welfare and prosperity of his people.

The most remarkable transaction that distinguished this session in the parliament of Ireland, was a generous resolution in favour of their lord-lieutenant the earl of Halifax, whose conduct they entirely approved of, and whose character they held in the utmost veneration. They unanimously resolved on an address to his excellency, desiring he would represent to the king the sense of the house, that the appointments of the lord-lieutenant were become inadequate to the dignity of that office; and that it was the humble desire of the house, that his majesty would be pleased to grant such augmentation to the lord lieutenant for the time being, as should raise the whole to the annual sum of sixteen thousand pounds. At the same time they expressed their satisfaction at the pleasing hope that this augmentation should take place during the administration of a chief governor whose many great and amiable qualities, whose wise and happy administration in the government of that kingdom, had universally endeared him to the people of Ireland. The earl received this glorious testimony of their approbation with all suitable acknowledgments; but, with a delicacy peculiar to himself, declined their proposal that the augmentation should take place during his government.

The peace of that kingdom had been for some time disturbed by a set of licentious people, who assembled in the night in arms, and committed many outrages in different parts of the kingdom. They were indiscriminately known by the name of White Boys and Levellers, because they wore linen shirts over their cloaths, the better to distinguish each other in the dark; and levelled all the inclosures which had encroached upon commons. This, indeed, was the principal grievance of which they complained. They looked upon every diminution of a common as an injury to the poor, who had used to enjoy the benefit of that common. They therefore not only destroyed the fences which had lately been made, but also robbed and maltreated the authors and proprietors of those encroachments. They even made head against some parties of regular troops, and some few lives were lost. A report began to prevail that those were no other than malcontents taking measures against the established government: that they were already increased to a formidable number, well armed and disciplined by officers, who had come for that purpose from France and other foreign countries. These surmises, however, were afterwards found to have been absolutely groundless, and all those petty insurrections were quelled by the vigilance and wise conduct of the lord-lieutenant, who, nevertheless, was obliged to make some examples of justice, in order to prevent such disturbances for the future.

If England was free from these domestic insurrections, yet her internal tranquillity was disturbed by the furious disputes which prevailed among the ministry. The whole council had been almost unanimous to oppose Mr. Pitt in his scheme for precipitating a declaration of war against Spain. They thought his principles were too violent, and they did not perfectly like his person. When he retired from public business, it seemed as if they breathed more freely, and had got rid of a burthen that oppressed them. But he was not long removed, when it appeared, that the remaining part of the system was framed upon principles so very discordant in themselves, that it was by no means likely to stand.

The D. of N——, first lord of the treasury, by his early zeal in favour of the Protestant succession, by the liberal and public use he had made of a great fortune, by the obligations, which, in a course of many years, and in a succession of great employments, he was enabled to confer on some of the most considerable people in the kingdom, had attached a great number to his fortunes, and formed a party in the parliament and the nation, which it was extremely difficult to overturn, or even to shake. He came to be considered as the head of the Whigs, and he was, in reality, well qualified, in many respects, for the chief of a party, by his unbounded liberality, by his affability, magnificence, and personal disinterestedness. Even the defects and faults, which might have appeared in his character, were rather of service to him, as they tended to soften resentments, and helped to give that great power, of which he was possessed, an appearance less formidable.

During a great part of the late king's reign, his family had directed all affairs without controul. On the accession of his present majesty, his situation seemed more doubtful; but, in a little time, he appeared outwardly as well established as ever, not only in his former high employments, but in that share of influence which is supposed to attend it. There was, however, very little reality in this specious appearance; for he did not possess the r—— confidence, upon which all the essential of power depends. Neither his age, nor his situation in the former reign, had allowed him an opportunity of cultivating an interest with the present k——. Another noble person had been in an employment near his person; and having formed his mind with much attention and success to those virtues which adorn his station, deserved and obtained a very uncommon share of his confidence.

This nobleman was first groom of the stole; afterwards engaging more openly in the conduct of affairs, he accepted the seals as secretary of state. On the removal of Mr. P——, who preserved a kind of union in the administration by their common dread of him, the only competition was between the D. of N—— and the E. of B——. The former could not well endure that decay of influence, which, on a thousand occasions, he must have sensibly felt, and which the great rank he held must have rendered only more painful. L. B——, on the other hand, could not bear to see the treasury board, which, under whatever limitations, was attended with so much power, in the hands of his rival. It is indeed a department, the entire conduct of which is absolutely necessary to the person, who has any pretensions to be at the head of the British administration.

These principles soon produced their natural effect. In a short time the D. of N—— thought himself obliged to resign, and L. B—— was appointed first lord of the treasury. Mr. George Grenville, brother to earl Temple, became secretary of state in the room of his lordship; and the place of first missioner of the admiralty being vacated by the death of lord Anson, that office was bestowed upon the earl of Halifax, now returned from Ireland. No one was surprised at the ferment occasioned by these alterations; in which personal resentment, party violence, and national or rather local prejudices, were all united, to throw every thing into confusion.

In this state of parties, a number of those called Whigs, who had lost their places, being highly irritated at the late changes, and even many of those, who still continued in employments, being supposed attached to the interest of the D. of N—, and therefore not to be depended on by the new administration, it became necessary to have recourse to those called Tories, or country gentlemen.

From the beginning of this reign, it had been proposed, with the general applause of all good men, to abolish those odious party distinctions, and to extend the royal favour and protection equally to all his majesty's subjects. The persons called Tories had, besides, been before active in support of those gentlemen, who now clamoured at the very measures, which they had themselves, more than once, adopted. Occasion, however, was taken from thence to endeavour at the revival of this almost exploded distinction. The two parties were inflamed against each other with the most violent animosity; and this was artfully blown up into a general combustion by every art and instrument of falsehood, which had ever proved effectual upon similar occasions.

Whilst the nation was thus distracted, the conduct of a war became difficult; its continuance unsafe; and its supplies uncertain. If the administration failed, their failure would be construed into incapacity: if they succeeded, their success would be converted into an argument for such terms of peace, as it would be impossible for them to procure. Above all, the ancient and known connection between the chiefs of the moneyed interest and the principal persons in the opposition, must have been a subject of great anxiety to the administration.

These causes co-operated to render the intentions of the British ministry towards peace altogether cordial and sincere: nevertheless, far from relapsing in their warlike operations, they prosecuted them with redoubled vigour, that the enemy might be the sooner reduced to the necessity of proposing equitable terms of accommodation. His majesty had already signified to the king of Prussia, that he would not renew the annual treaty, in consequence of which a very large subsidy had been granted to that prince; but, at the same time, gave him to understand that he should for the ensuing campaign, be still accommodated with pecuniary assistance; which was refused on any other condition than a renewal of the treaty. With regard to the British army in Westphalia, he gave orders that it should be supplied with all necessaries, and augmented to the number of one hundred thousand effective men. The French were already dispossessed of all their settlements in North America, except that of Louisiana, which was not considered as a very important object. It was determined therefore to transfer the seat of war from that continent; to attack the French islands the conquest of which I have already described; and to make a vigorous impression upon Spain, not only by attempting the reduction of the Havanna, which may be regarded as the key of the bay of Mexico; but also by making a descent on the island of Manilla, in the East-Indies, a country in which the French had now nothing left to be conquered.

The first of these expeditions was committed to the care of the earl of Albemarle, commander of the land forces, recommended for this service by the duke of Cumberland, under whose auspices he had been trained up to arms; and the ships of war appointed to co-operate in the attack, were commanded by Admiral Sir George Pococke, who had already distinguished himself by his gallantry in the East-Indies; his second was Mr. Keppel, brother to the earl, an able officer, who had reduced the isle of Goree, on the coast of Africa. They sailed from Portsmouth in the beginning of March; and arrived at the place of their destination without any considerable obstruction. Their proceedings shall be particularly related in their proper place. The expedition against Manilla was conducted by rear-admiral Cornish. He had sometime before sailed with an intention to reduce the French island of Bourbon or Mauritius. He was to have been joined by a reinforcement of ships from England, which, however, did not arrive at the place of rendezvous; and the greater part of his men being disabled by distempers, he was obliged to postpone the undertaking, which thus miscarried: I shall in due time give an account of the other, which proved more successful.

For the security of the British coast, and in order to answer the emergencies of war, a powerful squadron was kept in readiness at Spithead, under the direction of Sir Edward Hawke; another rode at anchor in the Downs, under the command of rear-admiral Moore; and from these two were occasionally detached into the Channel, and all round the coasts of the island, a number of light cruisers, which exerted themselves with such vigilance and activity, that not a ship could stir from any of the French sea-ports, without running the most imminent risque of being taken; and scarce a day passed without seeing some privateer of the enemy, either French or Spanish, brought into the harbours of Great-Britain. Some large ships of war were stationed in the bay of Basque, to watch the coast of Brittany, and in particular to have an eye upon Brest, where some of the enemy's ships of war lay at anchor.

Sir Charles Saunders was reinforced in such a manner as enabled him to maintain his superiority in the Mediterranean, and either to prevent a junction of the French and Spanish fleets, or, if that should be found impossible, to give them battle when joined. Lord Colville continued with his squadron at Halifax in Nova-Scotia, in order to protect the coast of North America, and the new conquest in the gulph and river of St. Laurence. Sir James Douglas still commanded the ships of war appointed for the defence of the Leeward islands; and captain Forest, since the death of admiral Holmes, directed the small squadron at Jamaica. Such was the general disposition for the offensive as well as the defensive measures of the campaign, and, indeed, it must be owned, in justice to the ministry, that it was planned with sagacity, and prosecuted with vigour.

I shall, as usual, begin my narrative of military transactions with describing the progress of the war on the continent of Europe.

The Bourbon alliance, it was strongly suspected, would soon be productive of some fatal consequences to the rest of Europe. It was not, however, altogether certain, where the storm that was gathering would first fall. There were some apprehensions for the peace of Italy; Holland had not a few causes of dread; and menaces were even used in that quarter. But Portugal seemed to be the most endangered, on account of her close and natural connection with Great-Britain, her internal weakness, the ancient claims of the Catholic king, and the opportunity of invasion; that kingdom being on all sides, except to the sea, in a manner inclosed by Spain.

Public conjecture was not mistaken in fixing upon Portugal. No mention was made, indeed, of the Spanish pretensions to that crown; but a resolution was taken to oblige her not only to renounce all friendship, but to violate her neutrality with Great-Britain. No scheme was ever projected with less appearance of justice; no proposition was ever made with more arrogance and presumption to an independent sovereign; and no enterprize seemed, according to every human appearance, so certain of success.

The kingdom of Portugal, on the recovery of her liberty, which happened in the year 1640, found herself stripped of the greatest part of those acquisitions, in both Indies, which had been the principal sources of her wealth, and the great monuments of the capacity of her former kings and commanders. During the interval of her subjection, new commercial powers had risen, some on the ruins of her fortune, and others upon different but not less substantial foundations. Though the Brazils were recovered, and Goa, and some other places in India, still remained to Portugal, her maritime power, and the share of trade, on which it depended, was altogether irrecoverable. Contrary to the fate of other nations, who have shaken off a foreign yoke, she did not owe her liberty to the exertion of any great abilities. Whilst the United Provinces were first freed, and afterwards aggrandized, by the capacity of the princes of Orange; and whilst Prussia, from an inconsiderable and dependent principality, grew, by the genius of her sovereigns, into a formidable monarchy, Portugal continued to languish in a state of mediocrity. Without any symptoms of danger to her existence, she suffered a gradual decay of her power and former influence. The principles of her government were narrow and bigotted, and the whole system of her commerce preposterous. If, on the one hand, a long peace added to the resources of her revenue, it, on the other, absolutely annihilated the spirit of her militia; and no country in the world had an army so incomplete in numbers, so ill furnished with arms, so deficient in discipline, and so wholly unprovided of able and experienced officers.

In this condition she suffered a fatal blow from the earthquake in 1756. The wealthy and flourishing city of Lisbon was laid level with the ground: near thirty thousand of the inhabitants were buried in the ruins; and those who remained, with the court itself, were reduced to the utmost distress and misery. As if this earthquake, which had overturned their capital, had also shaken and distracted the frame of their government, and the temper of their minds, the most dreadful distempers broke out in the state. A series of horrid crimes, and of cruel punishments, succeeded to this calamity. The most noble and wealthy family of Portugal, having engaged itself in a sacrilegious attempt on the life of their sovereign, was cut off at once with very little distinction of sex or age, by a bloody and dreadful exertion of justice. Many others, who were accused or suspected, suffered death, or exile, or imprisonment. Among these, and from the same causes, one of the most considerable religious orders for wealth, influence, and policy, was stripped of its possessions, and entirely driven out of the country.

These and the like circumstances had thrown this unhappy kingdom into a state of the most dangerous and dreadful confusion. All those, and they were not a few, who were attached, by connection of blood or interest, to the nobles that had suffered, or, by religious prejudice, to the jesuits, who had been expelled, could never be cordially relied upon by the crown, and were probably but little willing to make any very vigorous efforts in favour of a government, which their resentments must have represented to them as no better than a bloody tyranny. The Bourbon confederates had some ground to suppose, that Portugal, in this situation, would not have courage to withstand their menaces, and much less ability, for any long time, to resist their efforts. The Spanish army overspread the frontiers of Portugal; the commerce of corn between the two kingdoms was prohibited, and every thing seemed to threaten a sudden invasion.

In the midst of these hostile preparations the French and Spanish ambassadors at the court of Lisbon presented to the Portuguese ministry a joint memorial, importing, that the two sovereigns of France and Spain, being obliged to support a war against the English, had found it proper and necessary to establish several mutual and reciprocal obligations between them, and to take other indispensable measures to curb the pride of the British nation, which, by an ambitious project, to become despotic over the sea, and consequently over all maritime commerce, pretended to keep dependent the possessions of other powers in the new world, in order to introduce themselves there, either by an underhand usurpation, or by conquest: that the first measure which the kings of France and Spain had agreed on, was to have the most Faithful king in their offensive and defensive alliance, and to desire him to join their majesties forthwith: that they expected, that the most Faithful king would acquiesce therein, conformably to what he owed to himself, and to his kingdom, since his subjects felt, much more than other nations, the yoke which Great-Britain laid upon them, and which she meant to extend over all those, who had possessions beyond sea: that it would be unjust for France and Spain to sacrifice themselves for an object, in which Portugal was so much interested; and that, instead of assisting them, she would make it impossible for them them to succeed, by allowing the English to enrich themselves by her commerce, and to enter her ports, not only to make use of them as an asylum, but to be more at hand to hurt the defenders of Portugal: that in this spirit, the ambassador of Spain, and the minister plenipotentiary of France, desired the most Faithful king to declare himself united with their Catholic and most Christian majesties in the present war against the English, to break off all correspondence and commerce with that power, as the common enemy of all the three, and even of all maritime nations; to send away from his ports, and to shut them against all their men of war and merchant-ships; and to join to the forces of France and Spain, those which the Most High had put in his hands, in order to make them equal to those of the enemy: that this declaration was made by the two monarchs of France and Spain, as being agreed and concerted between them; his Catholic majesty had, in the mean time, instructed his ambassador to make this reflection to the most Faithful king (in order that his magnanimous breast might the more easily and the more speedily determine, without being stopped by other impressions, to take the part the most consonant to his advantage and to his glory) that it was the brother of the queen his wife, a true friend, and a moderate and quiet neighbour, who had made this proposal to him, and who had agreed to it, considering the interests of the most Faithful king as his own, and wishing to unite the one with the other, so as that, either in peace or in war, Spain and Portugal might be considered as belonging to one master; and in order to that, if any power should think of making war with Spain, they might not imagine they should find, in his own house, shelter and succours to attack her, as it happened, with regard to Portugal, in the wars, which king Philip the fifth, his father, and father-in-law of the most Faithful king, was obliged to support against England: how much more glorious, he asked, and more useful would it be for the most Faithful king to have, for his ally, a Catholic king, a near relation, his neighbour in Europe and America, to assist each other mutually with ease, than the English nation, incapable, by their haughtiness, of considering other sovereigns with equality, and always desirous to make them feel the influence of their power? and what occasion could the most Faithful king have for the assistance of England, when, by an offensive and defensive league, he should be united with Spain and France? That these considerations were so strong, that the Catholic king thought there could be no doubt, but that the most Faithful king, his brother-in-law, would yield to them, without stopping a moment; so much the more, as his Catholic majesty, before making this invitation, and in order to prevent the danger which the maritime places of Portugal might run, when the part taken by his most Faithful majesty should come to the knowledge of the English, had caused his troops to march to the frontiers of Portugal, so that, in a very few days, they might garrison the principal ports of the kingdom, and they would do it, after the answer of the most Faithful king, which, doubtless, would be as speedy, as clear, and as decisive as the necessity, and the positive determination of his Catholic majesty to prevent the designs of his enemies, required.

To this extraordinary memorial the two ministers added, that they were ordered by their courts to demand a categorical answer in four days; and that any delay, beyond that period, would be considered as a negative.

The situation of Portugal was at this time truly deplorable. If contrary to her known interests, contrary to her ancient connections, and to the faith of treaties, she should engage in this offensive alliance, she must expect to see her territories and her colonies exposed to the formidable navies of England. This dangerous condescension however, would not have secured her: by her own act, she would have put herself, bound hand and foot, into the power of the Bourbon alliance; and having received foreign garrisons into all her places of strength, would have reduced herself to the condition of a province of Spain. If, on the other hand, she adhered to her faith, and attempted to maintain her independency, an army of sixty thousand men was ready to enter her territories, which contained no place of real strength, and which had not twenty thousand troops, and those ill armed, and worse disciplined, to defend them.

In this emergency, the firmness of the king of Portugal was eminent, and such as must transmit his name to posterity with the most distinguished advantage. He resolved steadily to adhere to his ancient and natural alliance, and to brave all dangers and difficulties, that he might preserve his fidelity inviolable; following that noble maxim of king John of France, that if good faith were to be banished from all other parts of the world, it ought to be found in the breast of sovereigns.

His answer to this insulting proposition was humble and moderate, but firm. He observed, that the ties, which equally united him to Great-Britain, and the two crowns, rendered him as proper a mediator to them all, as they made it improper for him to declare himself an enemy to any of them: that his alliance with England was ancient, and therefore could give no offence at this juncture: that it was purely defensive, and therefore innocent in all its circumstances: that the late sufferings of Portugal disabled her, (in case she were willing) from taking part in an offensive war, into the calamities of which, neither the love his Faithful majesty bore his subjects as a father, nor the duty by which he was bound to them as a king, could suffer him to plunge them. Finally, he reminded the Catholic king of his pacific dispositions, by which on former occasions, he had yielded so much to preserve peace between the two crowns.

This reasonable and moderate answer drew on replies, which more and more disclosed the true spirit of the Bourbon confederacy. They denied that the alliance with England was purely defensive or entirely innocent; and for this unheard of reason, that the defensive alliance was converted into an offensive one, "from the situation of the Portuguese dominions, and from the nature of the English power." They said, that the English squadrons could not keep the sea at all seasons, nor cruize on the principal coasts for cutting off the French and Spanish navigation, without the ports and assistance of Portugal: that these islanders could not insult all the maritime powers of Europe, if all the riches of Portugal did did not pass into their hands: that therefore Portugal furnished them with the means of making war; and that, of consequence, their alliance with the court of Great-Britain was offensive.

This most certainly is the first time, that ever the situation of a country was given as a reason, however it may have served as a secret motive, for declaring war against it. Nor was it ever before heard, that the common advantages of trade, derived from a neutral nation, could be considered as an act of hostility. These were rather insults than arguments; and the whole proceedings of the Bourbon family were in the same strain. They undertook to judge for Portugal of the pretended yoke which was imposed upon her by England, and which she could not herself discover; to resent some injuries for her, which she had never felt; and to avenge others, for which she had received and accepted satisfaction: and as if this kind of indignity was not sufficient, they insultingly informed the king of Portugal, "that he ought to be glad of the necessity, which they laid upon him, to make use of his reason, in order to take the road of his glory, and the common interest." This necessity was the immediate march of their army to take possession of his dominions.

So extraordinary a treatment could neither divert the king from the firmness of his resolution, nor provoke him to depart from the moderation of his language. He maintained, that the treaties of peace and commerce, which subsisted between Portugal and Great-Britain, were such as the law of God, of nature, and of nations, had always deemed innocent. He intreated their most Christian and Catholic majesties to open their eyes to the crying injustice of pursuing against Portugal, the war kindled against Great-Britain. He desired them to consider, that they were giving an example, which would produce the destruction of mankind; that there would be an end of the public safety, if neutral nations were to be attacked, because they had defensive treaties with the belligerent powers: that a maxim so destructive would occasion the desolation of all Europe, the moment a war was kindled between any two states: that, therefore, if their troops should enter his dominions, he would, in defence of his neutrality, endeavour to repulse them with all his forces, and those of his allies; and he concluded with this magnanimous declaration, "that it would affect him less, though reduced to the last extremity, of which the Great Judge was the sole arbiter, to let the last tile of his palace fall, and to see his faithful subjects spill the last drop of their blood, than to sacrifice, together with the honour of his crown, all that Portugal held most dear; and to submit, by such extraordinary means, to become an unheard of example to all pacific powers, who would no longer be able to enjoy the benefit of neutrality, whenever a war should be kindled between other powers, with which the former were connected by defensive treaties." When this final resolution was thus spiritedly signified, passports were demanded for the ambassadors of the two crowns, who immediately departed, and in the month of June, France and Spain, jointly, declared war against Portugal.

By this time the British succours had arrived in Portugal, to the number of about eight thousand troops, partly drawn from Belleisle, and partly from Ireland, where two regiments of Roman catholics had been raised for this service, and a fine train of artillery was provided, together with large supplies of stores and ammunition. The king of Portugal had bestowed the supreme command of his army upon the count de Lippe Buckenbourg, an officer of distinguished abilities, who had directed the artillery of the British army in Westphalia during the whole course of this war. He was accompanied by one of the princes of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, brother to the queen of Great-Britain, who resolved to make this campaign in the Portuguese service. The English auxiliaries were conducted by the lord Trawley and the earl of Loudon; lieutenant-general Townshend, who had served with such reputation in America, was the next in command; and the subordinates were lord George Lennox, with the brigadiers Crawford and Burgoyne; the former of these last had been governor of Belleisle, where he was now succeeded by colonel Forrester, an accomplished officer, equally distinguished for his wit, politeness, and humanity; the other commanded a regiment of light horse, which were now numbered among the English troops who served in Portugal. Besides these, several natives of North-Britain, who had learned the art of war in the English or foreign service, were recommended for their merit to his Portuguese majesty, who promoted them to the command of regiments in his army.

Lord Trawley, disgusted at the behaviour of the court of Lisbon, and greatly disappointed in his expectations of the exertion they had promised to make of their own force, as well as of the use they had made of the succours from England, desired, in a short time, to be recalled to his own country, and was succeeded, in command, by the earl of Loudon, who, in conjunction with the count de la Lippe, resolved to begin the campaign without further delay.

The Spanish forces had been divided into three separate bodies, with a view to penetrate into Portugal by as many different avenues. The marquis de Sarria, who commanded the bulk of their army, consisting of thirty-six battalions and thirty-five squadrons, passed the rivers Douro and Esla, below Zamora. The body assembled in Galicia amounted to eight battalions of regular troops, six of militia, and two squadrons of horse; and the third in Andalusia amounted to four battalions regular, and the same number of militia, with eight squadrons of cavalry. The design was to form one camp between Villa-real, Braga and Oporto; a second under Abrantes; and a third in the neighbourhood of Elvas; so that their principal objects seemed to be Lisbon and Oporto, the two most important cities and sea-ports of Portugal, and the centers of the whole English commerce with that kingdom.

The first attempt of consequence they made was the siege of Miranda, which they invested in the beginning of May; but, before any battery could be erected, the magazine of the place taking fire by accident, and blowing up, made two large breaches in the walls, and about five hundred men of the garrison lost their lives by the explosion.

In consequence of this misfortune, the Portuguese garrison surrendered themselves prisoners of war, war, and the Spanish troops took possession of the city. From hence the marquis de Sarria sent a detachment to attack the town of Braganza; but the garrison retired with precipitation at their approach, and the magistrates presented the keys of the town to the Spanish commander. No steps had been taken for putting those two places in a proper posture of defence. In the course of the same month, colonel Alexander O Reily, being detached by the marquis of Sarria with a body of light armed horse and infantry, to make an attempt upon Chaves, that officer executed his orders with equal activity and success. He marched through bye-roads above fourteen leagues in two days, and shewed himself all of a sudden at the gates of the place: but it was already abandoned by the garrison, though it consisted of two thousand effective men, and the town was well provided with artillery, ammunition, stores, and provision for a vigorous defence. These, however, were rendered useless by the ruinous state of the fortifications, which had been long neglected.

After these exploits, the Spanish forces made an attempt to enter the province of Minho; but finding the passes of Monte Allegre defended by some regiments of militia, under the command of Don John de Lancastro, and Don Francisco Joseph Sarmiento; they changed their route, and resolved to pass the mountains of Maran and Amarante, that they might advance directly to the city of Oporto: precautions however had been taken to obstruct their passage, and some regular troops were ordered to garrison the city thus menaced. Part of the enemy that remained at Miranda had, in attempting to pass the river Douro, near Villa nova de Foscoa, been repulsed by the inhabitants, supported by some militia, who were now reinforced by a detachment of regular forces, under the command of the marquis de Angeja, and the count de Arcos. On the side of Almeida, the enemy, to the number of eight thousand, passed the frontier in the beginning of June, and encamped between Val-de-la-mula, and Val de Coelha, from whence they had detached parties to lay waste the country. In the province of Tralos-montes, the Spanish army was divided into three separate bodies, the principal of which was encamped in the neighbourhood of Miranda, the other at Torre de Moncorvo.

The army of Portugal, when assembled, was in no condition to face the enemy in the open field. All that could be done was to harass them in their advances through a barren country, rendered almost impassable by steep mountains and narrow passes. In ravaging the open country, the Spanish detachments committed some barbarities upon the peasants, and these were retaliated with interest; for an inveterate enmity has for a long time subsisted between the common people of these two nations, inflamed by former wars, and maintained by a long course of mutual rapine and other offices of bad neighbourhood. That body which had encamped near Val-de-la-mula, being considerably reinforced from Estremadura, and supplied with a train of artillery and other implements of siege, invested Almeyda in the month of July. On the twenty-fifth their trenches were opened, and next day they were joined by the French auxiliaries, to the number of eight thousand. On the twenty-fifth day of August the garrison capitulated, and the Spaniards took possession of the place, which made a much better defence than was expected.

The count de la Lippe, from the moment of his arrival in Portugal, took every step which military skill and prudence could dictate to form the troops to a regular discipline by the example of the English auxiliaries, who were mingled in due proportions with the different detachments posted in sundry parts of the kingdom, so as to guard the passes of the mountains, harass and annoy the enemy in their progress, intercept their convoys, and cut off their parties.

He then resolved to attack Valencia d'Alcantara, on the frontiers of Portugal, where, according to the intelligence he had received, the enemy had established large magazines of flour and forage. The place was at a considerable distance, and the design required uncommon courage, conduct, and expedition. The execution of this enterprize he committed to brigadier Burgoyne, who, on the twenty-fifth day of July, crossed the Tagus at midnight, with four hundred of his own dragoons, and put himself at the head of all the British grenadiers, commanded by lord Pulteney, and eleven companies of Portuguese grenadiers, with two pieces of light artillery, and two howitzers. Having marched through the country to Apallem, on the morning of the twenty-fifth he advanced to Castel-Vida, where, arriving late at night, he was joined by some infantry, and irregular cavalry, with forty-eight armed peasants; and here he made his final disposition, in consequence of the advices he received with regard to the situation and the state of the place he was determined to attack. Notwithstanding all the dispatch he could make in the night, he found himself overtaken by day-light, before he could reach Valencia; so that he was obliged to alter the disposition he had made, and advance with the cavalry at full gallop, in hopes of surprising the place. He accordingly entered the town sword in hand, dispersed the guards that were in the great square, and occupied the ends of the streets, having met with little or no resistance. Some desperate parties attacked the regiment when it was drawn up in the square, but they were all killed or taken. When the grenadiers arrived they sustained some loss by firings from windows, which however soon ceased, when the brigadier declared that he would set fire to the town at the four quarters of it, if they would not desist. A detachment of dragoons being sent out to scour the country, brought in some prisoners, with a good number of horses. A British serjeant and six men only, falling in with a subaltern of the enemy, at the head of twenty-five dragoons, unbroken and prepared for action, killed six, made all the rest prisoners, and took the horses of the whole party. Major general Don Michael d'Iruniberri, and Kalanca his aid-de-camp, one colonel with his adjutant, two captains, seventeen subalterns, fifty-nine soldiers, with three pair of colours, a great quantity of arms and ammunition, fell into the hands of the victor, who brought away hostages for the care of the wounded, and the payment of the king's revenue for one year, which he exacted as a consideration for having spared the town and convents. Lieutenant colonel Somerville, lord Pulteney, and major Singleton, Singleton, distinguished themselves in this action, which cost the British troops but one lieutenant, one serjeant, and three men killed, with ten horses, and about twenty private men wounded. The information which the count had received about the magazine, was groundless; but the Spanish major-general d'Iruniberri was to have invaded Alentejo in a few days, with a considerable detachment, and when taken was actually employed in reconnoitring the entrance into that province.

The Spanish army, now commanded by the Conde de Aranda, having left garrisons in Almeyda and Castel Rodrigo, advanced by Alfayates to Castel Branco; and this motion constrained the count de la Lippe to relinquish his strong camp at Ponte de Murcella in the Beira, from whence he marched back into Estremadura. On the eighteenth day of September, he arrived at Abrantes; and lord Loudon, with a separate corps, encamped at Sardoel in the neighbourhood. The business now was to prevent the Spaniards from forcing a passage through the mountains in their front, and from crossing the river Tagus at Villa-velha. For these purposes the marshal count de la Lippe ordered the count St. Jago, with four battalions, six companies of grenadiers, and a regiment of cavalry, to occupy the strong pass of Alvito, which had been always deemed impregnable; and brigadier general Burgoyne, with part of his own regiment, the royal volunteers, and the English grenadiers, encamped on the southern bank of the Tagus, over-against Villa-velha, where the great road from Castel Branco crosses the river into Alentejo.

Such was the disposition, when the enemy, on the first day of October, made several movements towards both these advanced bodies: they placed six thousand men over-against the corps of the count St. Jago, and attacked upon his right the old Moorish castle of Villa-velha, at the same time assailing a post upon his left, commanded by a major at the defile of St. Simon. Though brigadier Burgoyne for several days protected the castle of Villa-velha, by his cannon across the river, it was at length reduced, and the post of St. Simon taken: the enemy likewise made themselves masters of the passes of the mountains; so that the corps commanded by the count St. Jago was in the utmost danger of being attacked by superior forces, in front and rear.

In this emergency, the mareschal ordered lord Loudon to advance and cover the retreat of the count, who had instructions to retire. His lordship immediately proceeded with great expedition by the shortest road through the mountains, to Soubrira-formosa, where he was joined by major Macbean of the artillery, with four regimental field-pieces. The enemy, perceiving their intention to retreat, detached a strong body over the river Alvito, to attack the rear-guard, which was formed of four English regiments, six companies of Portuguese grenadiers, a few light dragoons, a regiment of Portuguese cavalry, with the four field-pieces, the whole under his lordship's command. The retreat was conducted with such good order and countenance, that not a man was lost, notwithstanding all the efforts of the enemy, who, being terribly annoyed by the artillery, thought proper to desist, while the forces of Portugal continued their march unmolested towards Cardegas.

The enemy having, by these motions, weakened their corps at Villa-velha, brigadier Burgoyne seized this favourable opportunity to surprise them in their quarters. He directed lieutenant-colonel Lee, with a detachment of British troops, to ford the Tagus in the night, and fall upon the Spanish camp. This gallant officer executed the plan with equal spirit and success, while the brigadier pointed his cannon, and made a false attack on the other side, to amuse and distract the enemy. The colonel having happily crossed the ford, and made himself master of a little village near the mountain of Villa-velha, where the Spanish magazines were established, entered their camp without being perceived, and a considerable slaughter ensued. The enemy being at length alarmed, began to make a confused and irregular defence; but being vigorously pushed by the grenadiers and volunteers, who used their bayonets without firing, they found it impossible to form, and were obliged to submit. The only part of them that made a regular stand was a body of horse, which lieutenant Maitland, at the head of Burgoyne's dragoons, attacked and routed in a few minutes. Most of the Spanish officers, including a brigadier-general, were killed in endeavouring to rally their forces. Four cannon were spiked up in their camp: their magazines were destroyed; some prisoners were taken, together with a good number of horses and mules, and a considerable quantity of valuable baggage. The loss of the English on this occasion, amounted only to ten men and horses.

This advantage being obtained in a critical moment, was attended with important advantages. The season was now far advanced; immense rains fell at this time; the roads were destroyed; the country became impracticable; and the Spaniards, having secured no advanced posts in which they could maintain themselves during the winter, and being especially unprovided with magazines for the support of their horse, every where fell back to the frontiers of Spain, where their supplies were at hand, and where they were not liable to be harassed by the efforts of the combined army.

In this manner Portugal was saved, at least for that campaign, by the wise conduct of the count de la Lippe, and the distinguished valour of the English commanders and soldiery: all that was wanting towards their deliverance was accomplished by the success of the English army in more distant quarters, and by the peace, in which so valuable and exposed an ally was not neglected. There never was, probably, so heavy a storm of national calamity, ready to fall upon an unprovided people, so happily averted, or so speedily blown over. Every thing, at the beginning of the campaign, bore the most lowering and ominous aspect to the affairs of Great-Britain. As it advanced, the sky continually cleared up; and the fortune of no nation, towards the close of it, was enlivened with a more brilliant and more unclouded prosperity.

Having thus related, with as much brevity as was consistent with perspicuity, the military operations in Portugal, I shall now take notice of the state of the several courts of Europe, and then proceed to describe the progress of the war in Germany, which still continued to be the principal object of attention.

The States general of the United Provinces still persisted in maintaining their neutrality, and in endeavouring to allay the heats occasioned by the misunderstanding between their East-India company and that of England. Their East-India factors had published an account of the mutual hostilities which had been committed in the river of Bengal; and this piece, which was artfully calculated to throw the blame of aggression upon the English, was fully refuted by an answer published at London, under the sanction of authentic documents. At length the directors of the Dutch company proposed an accommodation. The proposal was accepted by the English directors, and a deputation of merchants from Amsterdam were sent over to London for this purpose, which was happily accomplished. The merchants of Holland still murmured at the capture of their ships by the English cruisers, and, in the course of this year, loudly complained that their neutrality was again violated by a British sloop, which drove on shore and destroyed a French privateer on the coast of Scheveling: but the states were too wise to enter into the resentments of the people; they knew their merchants had provoked this treatment, by carrying on a contraband commerce ever since the beginning of the war, in favour of the enemies of Great-Britain; nor would they allow such a petty insult as that of the British cruiser, to come in competition with the friendship of the British monarch, which, therefore, they continued assiduously to cultivate.

The domestic tranquillity of France was still disturbed by the dispute between the parliaments and the Jesuits. We have already remarked, that the society had been condemned by arrets or decrees of the parliaments of Paris, Normandy, and Bretagne, in consequence of the doctrines which they taught and promulgated in favour of equivocation and mental reservation, excusing regicide, homicide, perjury, profanation, impurity, and irreligion; in short, the breach of every moral duty, upon certain occasions. The edict issued by the king for suspending the execution of the sentence against the Jesuits, the parliaments refused to register. That of Paris published a new arret in April, containing extracts from the books of the Jesuits to the amount of a large quarto volume, which was presented to the king at Versailles by the first president, at the head of twenty members. Mean while the Jesuits, trusting, in all probability, to their great interest among the clergy, and their own address, which had seldom failed them, still delayed the payment which they had been condemned to make to their creditors; and in consequence of this delay, the parliament of Paris issued a new arret in the course of the same month, for sequestering all their effects within their jurisdiction. Nevertheless, they still continued to sell their merchandize for ready money until a guard was placed upon their college in the Rue St. Jaques; and places were appointed for taking informations concerning their effects. In a word, they were now become so unpopular with the nation in general, and the clamour against them grew so loud, that the king found it necessary to give them up to justice. All their colleges were seized; all their effects confiscated; and, with respect to France, the order itself was annihilated.

As the navy of France had, for some time, been almost totally annihilated, several communities of that kingdom engaged to build ships of war for the king's service; and large sums were subscribed by individuals for the purpose. After the conclusion of the last campaign, the court of Versailles became the scene of intrigues, between the prince of Soubise and the mareschal duke de Broglie, who accused each other, and, in all appearance, were both equally guilty, of having retarded and impeded the operations of the last campaign, by their mutual jealousies and animosity. In this civil contest, the prince de Soubise, being supported by the interest of madame de Pompadour, gained a complete victory over his rival, who was deprived of his command, and, together with his brother, banished from court, to the great mortification of the people, who looked upon the mareschal as a general of superior abilities. It was now resolved that the prince de Soubise should command the army in Westphalia, in conjunction with the count d'Estrees, who was esteemed an excellent officer; and that another army should be assembled on the lower Rhine, under the command of the prince de Condé, whose high rank was not the greatest of his qualifications.

The king of Spain was so bent upon prosecuting the war against Portugal, that he seems to have taken little pains in securing his West Indian settlements from the resentment of Great-Britain, which he had so injudiciously provoked. True it is, the moment his council resolved upon a war with England, he sent three ships of war, with four transports, having on board two battalions of troops, with artillery and ammunition from Ferrol to the West-Indies; and dispatched several vessels with advice of the rupture to his American colonies; but considering the risque of their being intercepted by the British cruisers, who covered the sea, he ought not to have rushed precipitately into the war, until his settlements had been put into a proper posture of defence, and every other necessary precaution had been taken.

We have seen, in the close of the last year, that, by the taking of Colberg, on the one hand, and Schweidnitz, on the other, the king of Prussia's dominions were intirely at the mercy of his enemies: his forces were worn away, and even his efforts had gradually declined: a complete victory, though this was an event not at all probable, could not save him. The Russians, by wintering in Pomerania, and by the possession of Colberg, which insured them supplies by a safe and expeditious channel, were in a condition to commence their operations much earlier than usual, as well as to prosecute them with greater spirit and perseverance. No resource of policy could be tried with the least prospect of success. After such a resistance, for five years, of which the world had never furnished another example, the king of Prussia had nothing left but such a conduct as might close the scene with glory, since there was so little likelihood of his concluding the war with safety.

In the midst of these gloomy appearances, his inveterate and inflexible enemy, the empress of Russia, died, in the sixty-third year of her age, and the twenty-second of her reign.

She was succeeded on the throne by her nephew Charles-Peter-Ulric, a prince of the house of Holstein, stein, who had been created by his aunt grand duke of Russia, and now assumed the sceptre under the name of Peter III. None but those who were intimately acquainted with the character and disposition of the new Czar, could have any reason to imagine, that he would abandon the system of his predecessor, which was certainly founded on the true interests of the country he governed. The king of Prussia himself seemed, for some time, to have entertained no great hopes from this change. The Czar had, however, on many occasions, discovered marks of esteem for the character of that monarch. He was a knight of the black eagle, of which order the king of Prussia is grand master. His Prussian majesty, however, could derive no great hopes from this circumstance.

The eyes of all Europe were now fixed upon the steps which the new Czar might take. With regard to the government of his country, nothing could be more popular and auspicious than his first measures. The earliest use he made of his absolute power, was to set the Russian nobility and gentry free, and to put them on the same footing with those of their rank in the other more moderate governments of Europe. Almost all the exiles were recalled to court, and among the rest the unfortunate count Biron, who, from a sovereign prince, had been reduced to the most wretched condition, in the most wretched country on the globe. He had been many years a peasant of Siberia, and is now once more become a sovereign prince. It is in these despotic governments we see the most striking excesses, and dismal reverses of fortune; in which one day a person is raised to something almost above man, and the next is, perhaps in a moment, degraded to the lowest station of humanity.

The new emperor proceeded, in his reformation, to abolish some severe and tyrannical jurisdictions; and extending the same benign disposition to all degrees of his subjects, he lessened the tax upon the salt, to the very great and universal relief of the poor.

Those beginnings gave the most favourable impressions of his domestic government; but Europe was principally concerned in his foreign politics; nor was it long before his dispositions to peace became apparent. What astonished the world most, was the high rate at which he valued this blessing. In a memorial which he caused to be delivered, on the twenty-third day of February, to the ministers of the allied courts, he declared, "that in order to the establishment of peace, he was ready to sacrifice all the conquests made by the arms of Russia in this war, in hopes that the allied courts would, on their part, equally prefer the restoration of peace and tranquillity to all the advantages which they might expect from the continuance of the war, but which they could not obtain but by a continuance of the effusion of human blood."

The allies praised the disinterestedness, spirit, and humanity of this declaration; but recommended to his attention the fidelity to treaties, which constitutes a no less valuable part of the royal character, and a no less considerable branch of the duty of a monarch to his subjects. They shewed a disposition to imitate his desire for peace, but by no means to follow his example in purchasing it by a cession of all the advantages, which they had acquired or hoped to acquire by the war.

The Czar having thus far complied with decency, and being of a temper little fitted to wait the slow procedure of a joint negotiation, gave way to his ardent desires for peace, and to the sentiments of that extravagant admiration which he had conceived for the king of Prussia. A suspension of hostilities was concluded between them on the sixteenth of March; and it was followed, not long after, by a treaty of peace and alliance. Nothing was stipulated by the Czar in favour of his former confederates, whom he entirely abandoned. He even agreed to join his troops to those of the king of Prussia, to act against them. In a little time a Russian army was seen with one of Prussia, to drive out of Silesia those very Austrians, who had been a few months before brought into that province by the Russian arms.

This was a miraculous revolution. Fortune, who had so long abandoned the king of Prussia to the resources of his genius, after having persecuted him for near five years, and overwhelmed him with the whole weight of her anger, at length made him amends, and did for him at one stroke, the only thing, by which he could possibly be saved.

Sweden, who, since she has recovered her liberty, has lost her political influence, and for a long time acted entirely under the direction of Russian councils, followed, on this, as on all other occasions, the example of the court of Petersburg, and on the twenty-second of May, signed a treaty of peace with the king of Prussia.

In order to account for whatever was not the result of mere personal character in this extraordinary revolution of politics in Russia, it will be necessary to take notice, once more, that the Czar Peter the third was duke of Holstein; and that the dukes of Holstein had pretensions to the duchy of Sleswick. These pretensions were given up by a treaty in 1732. But as the cession made by the house of Holstein in this treaty was the effect of necessity, it had been always apprehended, that she would make use of the first fair opportunity of asserting her ancient rights. The Czar seized eagerly on the great once, which the possession of the whole Russian power afforded him, and he resolved to enter into an immediate war for this object, to which his predilection for his native country gave, in his eyes, a far greater importance than to all the conquests of his predecessor. As long as the war with the king of Prussia lasted, it was impossible that his designs against Denmark could be prosecuted with any hope of success. Wholly indifferent, therefore, to all others, and passionately fond of this object, as soon as he came to the throne, without any dispute or negotiation, he offered the king of Prussia in his great distress every thing he could have hoped from a series of victories; and whilst he joined his arms to those of that monarch in Silesia, he caused an army to march towards Holstein.

Thus the peace with Russia, far from conducing to the general peace of Europe, did very little more than change the face of the war. It brought in new subjects of dispute, and new parties, and by threatening Denmark, left not a single power in the North in a state of assured tranquillity.

The king of Denmark, though menaced by so formidable a power engaged in pursuit of a favourite object, was not terrified into any mean concessions. He recruited his army, repaired his fortifications, and prepared for his defence, with temper and magnanimity. As money must be necessary for the services of so important a war; as his country could furnish no great supplies; and the borrowings in every part of Europe, together with the sudden invasion of his dominions, could enable him to form no sanguine hope of public credit; he turned his eyes towards the city of Hamburgh, which had grown rich by its industry and neutrality during the whole war, and by the number of wealthy individuals who had fled thither for refuge from the calamities, with which all the neighbouring countries had been afflicted.

His Danish majesty had always kept alive a claim of sovereignty over that city, which, however founded, he had taken care to exercise whenever he found it convenient. The present appeared to him to be one of those conjunctures. Accordingly, without any previous notice, he appears with a strong army before Hamburgh, seizes the suburbs, and threatens the city with an immediate siege, if they did not immediately agree to a loan of one million of rixdollars. The magistrates of this trading city, unaccustomed to war, unprepared for defence, having no ally at hand, and dreading equally the neighbourhood of an ally, who should be able to protect them, prudently submitted, and furnished the king with such a supply as his affairs required.

While the king of Denmark took those bold and vigorous measures for the defence of his dominions, the affairs of his enemy were running fast into confusion. From the moment of the late Czar's accession to the throne of the Russias, something extraordinary was expected. His disposition seemed to lead him to make changes in every thing; and having set before him two great examples, that of the king of Prussia, and of his predecessor Peter the first, it was apprehended, that this vast empire was going once more, almost within the life of a man, to assume a new face; a circumstance, which could not fail of having a mighty influence on the affairs of Europe. Peter the third made more new regulations in Russia in a few weeks, than wise and cautious princes undertake in a long reign. It was to be feared, that his conduct proceeded rather from a rash and irregular turn of mind, and a spirit of innovation, than from any regular and well-digested plan, for the improvement of his extensive dominions. True it is, his first actions, on coming to the throne, were laudable, and seemed well calculated to acquire him the affections of his people. But if in some instances he consulted their interests, in many he shocked their prejudices; and he lost thereby that good opinion of his subjects, which is so useful on all occasions, but absolutely necessary for carrying such uncommon designs as his into execution.

The preference he so manifestly gave to the uncertain hope of inconsiderable conquest, in Holstein, over the solid and valuable possessions which the fortune of his predecessor had left him, must have disgusted all the politicians of his country. His intimate connection with, and boundless admiration of that prince, with whom Russia had been, so lately, and so long, in a state of violent hostility, could not add to the opinion of his prudence. They thought he departed from his imperial dignity, in soliciting, with so much anxiety, a command in the Prussian service. When he received it, he dressed himself in the Prussian uniform, made a grand festival, and displayed all the marks of an immoderate and puerile satisfaction. He pushed his extravagance in this point so far, that he made preparations, in this immature state of his government, to quit Russia, and to go into Germany, in order to have an interview with that great monarch, whose genius, principles, and fortune, he so greatly admired.

Although this proceeding was, almost in every respect, extremely impolitic, it did not threaten such dangerous consequences, as the other steps which he took about the same time. The soldiery and the clergy are the great supports of all absolute rule; and they are certainly the last bodies, upon which a prince of this kind would chuse to exert any invidious act of authority. But the Czar was indiscreet enough, very early in his reign, highly to provoke both those bodies; the soldiery, by the manifest preference he gave to his Holstein guards, and to all the officers of that nation; and by the change he made in favour of the Prussian uniform to the exclusion of that, in which the Russians believed they had so often asserted the honour of their country, and gained many signal advantages over the troops distinguished by those regimentals which were now preferred.

These trifles had very important consequences; but what he did in matters of religion, was still more dangerous. This prince had been educated a Lutheran; and though he conformed to the Greek church, in order to qualify him for the succession, he never shewed much respect to that mode of religion, to the rules and doctrines of which his subjects had been always extremely attached. He seized upon the revenues of the ecclesiastics, whether monks or seculars, whether bishops or inferiors; and, for compensation, allowed them some mean pension, in such a proportion as his fancy suggested. He even ventured to attack the beards of the clergy, which were no longer allowed to grow to their usual length; an innovation, which, though seemingly trifling, was productive of the most fatal effects. He made likewise some regulations concerning the images and pictures in their churches, which gave them reason to apprehend his intention of accomplishing a total change in the system of religion, and introducing the doctrines of Luther.

While he was taking these measures to alienate the minds of his people in general, and especially of those bodies, with whom it was the most his interest to be well, he had not the good fortune to live in harmony with his own family. He had long slighted his consort, a princess of the house of Anhalt Zerbst, a woman of a masculine temper, bold, politic, ambitious, and vindictive. He maintained an amorous correspondence with the countess of Woronzoff, niece to the chancellor of that name, and seemed attached to her with so strong a passion, as to occasion a suspicion of his intending to throw his empress into a monastery, and raise this lady to the throne of all the Russias.

What seemed to confirm this suspicion, was his omitting formally to declare his son, the grand duke Paul Petrowitz, his successor. This omission in a country where the succession is established and regular, would have been of no consequence: the punctual observance of such a ceremony would have betrayed some doubt of the title. But the nature of this government, as well as positive constitutions, had made it necessary in Russia, and the omission of it was certainly alarming.

They assured themselves that their project could not be disagreeable to the empress; whose conduct had always been the very reverse of that of her consort. This princess, finding that the affections of her husband were irrecoverably alienated, endeavoured to set up a separate and independent interest in her own favour, and for asserting the rights of her son. She therefore assiduously cultivated the affections of the Russian nation, and paid a respect to their manners and religion, in the same degree as her husband seemed to condemn both.

So ill was the Czar served, that this conspiracy was grown general, without his receiving the least notice of it; and he remained in perfect security, while the senate and the clergy were assembled to pass the sentence of his deposition. At this time the empress and he were both absent from the capital at different country-seats. The empress was no sooner informed that the design was ripe for execution, than she got on horseback, and repaired with all possible speed to Petersburg. She immediately harangued the guards, who cheerfully and unanimously declared in her favour, and proclaimed her empress of Russia, independently of her husband. She then addressed herself to the clergy, and the chief of the nobility, who applauded her resolution; and all orders immediately took the oath of allegiance to her as sole empress. No sooner was she acknowledged in this manner, than, without losing a moment's time, she marched from Petersburg towards the emperor, at the head of a body of troops.

This prince was indulging himself in indolent amusements, and lulled in the most profound security at a house of pleasure, called Oraniebaum, on the sea-shore, when a soldier brought him an account that his kingdom was taken away from him.

Astonished, and wholly unprepared for this event, he was some time senseless, and intirely at a loss what part to take. When finally aroused from this trance by the approaching danger, his first resolution was to defend the place with his Holstein guards; but, though satisfied of their attachment, he doubted their strength, and he knew it was in vain to hope for any effort in his favour from the Russians.

Nothing then remained but flight, by which he might escape to Holstein, and wait some favourable turn of fortune. This late lord of powerful fleets and armies embarked in a small vessel, with a few attendants, and rowed towards Cronstadt; but he had not proceeded very far, when he was informed that this fortress was in the hands of his enemies, and that every avenue for escape was shut against him. Dejected and desponding, he returned to Oraniebaum. After some short and tumultuous deliberation, he resolved to abandon all thoughts of defence, and to throw himself on the compassion of the empress.

On her march she met his messengers, who brought letters containing a renunciation of the empire, and stipulating no other terms than leave to return to Holstein, and the satisfaction of taking with him, as the companions of his retreat, the countess of Woronzoff and one single friend.

Reasons of state could not permit the empress to consent to the first of those terms; and the last she considered as an insult on her honour. His terms were rejected; and he was required to sign an unconditional resignation of his crown, according to a form that was prepared for him. Not satisfied with depriving him of his crown, they even resolved to make him the murderer of his own reputation; and this unfortunate prince, moved with the vain hope of life, signed a paper, declaring his conviction of his inability to govern the empire, either as a sovereign, or in any other capacity, and his sense of the distress, in which his continuing at the head of affairs would inevitably involve it. After he had signed this abdication, he gave up his sword, and was conducted to prison, where, in a short time, but according to what had been universally expected, he died. The disorder, which killed him, was called an hemorrhoidal cholic.

Thus was a revolution of such immense importance effected in a single day, and without shedding a single drop of blood. The unfortunate emperor enjoyed the power of which he had made so imprudent and impolitic an use, no longer than six months. His consort, without any hereditary title, is sovereign mistress of the Russian empire; and the most absolute power on earth is now held by an elective monarch.

Immediately after this revolution a number of manifestoes appeared, in which the conduct of the late emperor was condemned, the weakness of his personal character exposed, and designs of the blackest nature, even that of murdering his consort, attributed to him. These manifestoes were at the same replete with the strongest declarations of affection from the empress to the people of Russia, of regard to their interests, and of attachment to their religion; and they were all filled with such unaffected and fervent strains of piety, as must have been extremely edifying to those who were were acquainted with the religious disposition of the empress, her moderate and unambitious temper, and particularly her innocence as to the death of her husband, which, yet, the malicious and incredulous part of the world obstinately persisted in laying to her charge.

Whatever truth there might be in these surmises, certain it is, that nothing could be more prudent and circumspect than the conduct of the empress. In almost every respect it was the very reverse of that of her husband. She dismissed all foreigners from her confidence and service; she sent away the Holstein guards, and chose Russian, whose ancient uniform was revived with new lustre, the empress herself frequently condescending to appear in it. The clergy were restored to the possession of their revenues and their beards. She conferred all the great posts of the empire on native Russians, and entirely threw herself on the affections of that people, to whom she owed her elevation.

This great change in the government of Russia, it was universally feared, would be followed by a total change of system with regard to foreign affairs. The peace and alliance with the king of Prussia were very unpopular measures in Muscovy; nor was it probable that the close and intimate connection, which had subsisted between that prince and the late Czar, would greatly recommend him to the successor. And as it was imagined, that this revolution must have been, in a great degree, owing to the machinations of those courts, whom the Czar had provoked by withdrawing from their alliance, there was the greater reason to apprehend, that the power, which was now set up, would be exerted in their favour.

There were also great advantages on the side of Russia, if the empress should not hold the peace, concluded by her late husband, to be binding on her, as none of the conquests were at this time evacuated. In a word, every thing seemed to conspire towards replunging the king of Prussia into the abyss of his former distresses, after he had emerged from them only for such a time, and in such a manner, as to make the renewal of them more bitter and insupportable.

Fortunately, however, for this wonderful man, the empress, who had come to the Russian throne in the manner we have related, could not look upon herself as sufficiently secure to undertake again a war of so much importance as that which had just been concluded. It was necessary, for some time at least, that she should confine her attention solely to her own safety. For this purpose it was expedient to collect, within itself, all the force of the empire, in order to oppose it to the designs of the many malecontents, with which that empire always abounds, and who, though not attached to the interests of the Czar, and little inclined to revenge his fate, would find now both inducement and opportunity for raising troubles and attempting new changes. Very plausible pretences for such attempts existed from the time of Peter the Great, who, while he improved and strengthened his kingdom, left in it, at the same time, the seeds of civil wars and revolutions.

These considerations induced the Czarina, however unwillingly, to continue so much of the system of her predecessor, as coincided with her situation. She therefore declared to the king of Prussia's ministers, that she was resolved to observe inviolably, in all points, the perpetual peace concluded under the preceding reign; but that, nevertheless, she had thought proper to bring back to Russia, by the nearest roads, all her troops, in Silesia, Prussia, and Pomerania.

This moderation was not owing to the critical situation alone of the Czarina: the prudent behaviour of his Prussian majesty, during the time of his connection with the late Czar, contributed likewise, in a great measure, to reconcile to him the mind of this empress, and to perpetuate something like the same friendship, with interests so very different. The Russian senate, flaming with resentment against this monarch, and against their late sovereign; and the empress, full of suspicion, that the conduct of the latter might have been influenced by the councils of the former, searched, eagerly, among the papers of the late emperor, for elucidation or proofs of this point. They found, indeed, many letters from the king of Prussia; but in a strain absolutely different from what they apprehended. The king of Prussia had, as far as prudence would admit, kept a reserve and distance in regard to the rash advances of this unhappy ally. Too experienced to be carried away by his inconsiderate impetuosity, he gave him much salutary, though fruitless, advice. He counselled him to undertake nothing against the empress his consort; to desist from the war with Denmark; to attempt no changes in the religion and fundamental laws of the country; and to lay aside all thoughts of coming into Germany.

On hearing these letters read, the empress is said to have burst into tears of gratitude, and made, in consequence, the strongest declarations in favour of this prince. Nor were they without effect. Orders had been given with relation to Prussia, which threatened a renewal of hostilities; but these were soon countermanded. The army of the Russians was, indeed, separated from that of Prussia; but all the important places, which the Russians had, with so much bloodshed, and through so many difficulties, acquired, and which gave them the command of every thing else that remained to the king, were instantly restored. An immediate end was likewise put to the war between Prussia and Denmark; and every thing in relation to Holstein replaced upon its former footing.

Having thus given a concise and, I hope, a faithful account of the revolutions in Russia, I shall now proceed to relate the transactions of the war as it was carried on in Germany.

In the beginning of the year, the Austrian and Prussian armies continued very quiet in their winter quarters: but prince Henry, who conducted the troops in Saxony, extended his forces, in January, by driving the Imperial army to a greater distance, and occupying Naumberg, Zeitz, Altenburg, and Gera. On the other hand, the Imperial and Saxon troops dislodged the Prussians in February, from the post of Lamatch, and destroyed the magazine which had been transported thither from Magdeburg. In the beginning of May, this active prince suddenly crossing the Mulda in three columns, at Roswin, Dolbeling, and Leisnig, attacked the left wing of the Imperial and Austrian army; on which occasion, general Zetwitz was taken with twelve officers, fifteen hundred men, and three piece

What seemed to confirm this suspicion, was his omitting formally to declare his son, the grand duke Paul Petrowitz, his successor. This omission in a country where the succession is established and regular, would have been of no consequence: the punctual observance of such a ceremony would have betrayed some doubt of the title. But the nature of this government, as well as positive constitutions, had made it necessary in Russia, and the omission of it was certainly alarming.

That unfortunate prince having, in this manner, affronted his army, irritated his clergy, offended the nobility, and alienated his own family, without having left himself any firm ground of authority, in personal esteem, or national prejudices, proceeded with his usual precipitation to new changes. In the mean time a most dangerous conspiracy was forming against him. The cruel punishments, inflicted in Russia on state criminals, tend only the more to harden the minds of men already fierce and obdurate, and seldom deter them from the most desperate undertakings. Rosamowski, Hetman or chief of the Cossacks, a person of importance by that command, Panin, governor of the great duke Paul, marshal Buterlin, the chamberlain Teplow, the attorney-general Glebow, baron Orlow, major of the guards, and many other of the great officers and first nobility of the empire, engaged in a conspiracy to dethrone the Czar, who was now universally hated; and what was more fatal to him, universally despised.

They assured themselves that their project could not be disagreeable to the empress; whose conduct had always been the very reverse of that of her consort. This princess, finding that the affections of her husband were irrecoverably alienated, endeavoured to set up a separate and independent interest in her own favour, and for asserting the rights of her son. She therefore assiduously cultivated the affections of the Russian nation, and paid a respect to their manners and religion, in the same degree as her husband seemed to condemn both.

So ill was the Czar served, that this conspiracy was grown general, without his receiving the least notice of it; and he remained in perfect security, while the senate and the clergy were assembled to pass the sentence of his deposition. At this time the empress and he were both absent from the capital at different country-seats. The empress was no sooner informed that the design was ripe for execution, than she got on horseback, and repaired with all possible speed to Petersburg. She immediately harangued the guards, who cheerfully and unanimously declared in her favour, and proclaimed her empress of Russia, independently of her husband. She then addressed herself to the clergy, and the chief of the nobility, who applauded her resolution; and all orders immediately took the oath of allegiance to her as sole empress. No sooner was she acknowledged in this manner, than, without losing a moment's time, she marched from Petersburg towards the emperor, at the head of a body of troops.

This prince was indulging himself in indolent amusements, and lulled in the most profound security at a house of pleasure, called Oraniebaum, on the sea-shore, when a soldier brought him an account that his kingdom was taken away from him.

Astonished, and wholly unprepared for this event, he was some time senseless, and intirely at a loss what part to take. When finally aroused from this trance by the approaching danger, his first resolution was to defend the place with his Holstein guards; but, though satisfied of their attachment, he doubted their strength, and he knew it was in vain to hope for any effort in his favour from the Russians.

Nothing then remained but flight, by which he might escape to Holstein, and wait some favourable turn of fortune. This late lord of powerful fleets and armies embarked in a small vessel, with a few attendants, and rowed towards Cronstadt; but he had not proceeded very far, when he was informed that this fortress was in the hands of his enemies, and that every avenue for escape was shut against him. Dejected and desponding, he returned to Oraniebaum. After some short and tumultuous deliberation, he resolved to abandon all thoughts of defence, and to throw himself on the compassion of the empress.

On her march she met his messengers, who brought letters containing a renunciation of the empire, and stipulating no other terms than leave to return to Holstein, and the satisfaction of taking with him, as the companions of his retreat, the countess of Woronzoff and one single friend.

Reasons of state could not permit the empress to consent to the first of those terms; and the last she considered as an insult on her honour. His terms were rejected; and he was required to sign an unconditional resignation of his crown, according to a form that was prepared for him. Not satisfied with depriving him of his crown, they even resolved to make him the murderer of his own reputation; and this unfortunate prince, moved with the vain hope of life, signed a paper, declaring his conviction of his inability to govern the empire, either as a sovereign, or in any other capacity, and his sense of the distress, in which his continuing at the head of affairs would inevitably involve it. After he had signed this abdication, he gave up his sword, and was conducted to prison, where, in a short time, but according to what had been universally expected, he died. The disorder, which killed him, was called an hemorrhoidal cholic.

Thus was a revolution of such immense importance effected in a single day, and without shedding a single drop of blood. The unfortunate emperor enjoyed the power of which he had made so imprudent and impolitic an use, no longer than six months. His consort, without any hereditary title, is sovereign mistress of the Russian empire; and the most absolute power on earth is now held by an elective monarch.

After he had signed this abdication, he gave up his sword, and was conducted to prison, where, in a short time, but according to what had been universally expected, he died. The disorder, which killed him, was called an hemorrhoidal cholic.

Thus was a revolution of such immense importance effected in a single day, and without shedding a single drop of blood. The unfortunate emperor enjoyed the power of which he had made so imprudent and impolitic an use, no longer than six months. His consort, without any hereditary title, is sovereign mistress of the Russian empire; and the most absolute power on earth is now held by an elective monarch.

Immediately after this revolution a number of manifestoes appeared, in which the conduct of the late emperor was condemned, the weakness of his personal character exposed, and designs of the blackest nature, even that of murdering his consort, attributed to him. These manifestoes were at the same replete with the strongest declarations of affection from the empress to the people of Russia, of regard to their interests, and of attachment to their religion; and they were all filled with such unaffected and fervent strains of piety, as must have been extremely edifying to those who were acquainted with the religious disposition of the empress, her moderate and unambitious temper, and particularly her innocence as to the death of her husband, which, yet, the malicious and incredulous part of the world obstinately persisted in laying to her charge.

Whatever truth there might be in these surmises, certain it is, that nothing could be more prudent and circumspect than the conduct of the empress. In almost every respect it was the very reverse of that of her husband. She dismissed all foreigners from her confidence and service; she sent away the Holstein guards, and chose Russian, whose ancient uniform was revived with new lustre, the empress herself frequently condescending to appear in it. The clergy were restored to the possession of their revenues and their beards. She conferred all the great posts of the empire on native Russians, and entirely threw herself on the affections of that people, to whom she owed her elevation.

This great change in the government of Russia, it was universally feared, would be followed by a total change of system with regard to foreign affairs. The peace and alliance with the king of Prussia were very unpopular measures in Muscovy; nor was it probable that the close and intimate connection, which had subsisted between that prince and the late Czar, would greatly recommend him to the successor. And as it was imagined, that this revolution must have been, in a great degree, owing to the machinations of those courts, whom the Czar had provoked by withdrawing from their alliance, there was the greater reason to apprehend, that the power, which was now set up, would be exerted in their favour.

There were also great advantages on the side of Russia, if the empress should not hold the peace, concluded by her late husband, to be binding on her, as none of the conquests were at this time evacuated. In a word, every thing seemed to conspire towards replunging the king of Prussia into the abyss of his former distresses, after he had emerged from them only for such a time, and in such a manner, as to make the renewal of them more bitter and insupportable.

Fortunately, however, for this wonderful man, the empress, who had come to the Russian throne in the manner we have related, could not look upon herself as sufficiently secure to undertake again a war of so much importance as that which had just been concluded. It was necessary, for some time at least, that she should confine her attention solely to her own safety. For this purpose it was expedient to collect, within itself, all the force of the empire, in order to oppose it to the designs of the many malecontents, with which that empire always abounds, and who, though not attached to the interests of the Czar, and little inclined to revenge his fate, would find now both inducement and opportunity for raising troubles and attempting new changes. Very plausible pretences for such attempts existed from the time of Peter the Great, who, while he improved and strengthened his kingdom, left in it, at the same time, the seeds of civil wars and revolutions.

These considerations induced the Czarina, however unwillingly, to continue so much of the system of her predecessor, as coincided with her situation. She therefore declared to the king of Prussia's ministers, that she was resolved to observe inviolably, in all points, the perpetual peace concluded under the preceding reign; but that, nevertheless, she had thought proper to bring back to Russia, by the nearest roads, all her troops, in Silesia, Prussia, and Pomerania.

This moderation was not owing to the critical situation alone of the Czarina: the prudent behaviour of his Prussian majesty, during the time of his connection with the late Czar, contributed likewise, in a great measure, to reconcile to him the mind of this empress, and to perpetuate something like the same friendship, with interests so very different. The Russian senate, flaming with resentment against this monarch, and against their late sovereign; and the empress, full of suspicion, that the conduct of the latter might have been influenced by the councils of the former, searched, eagerly, among the papers of the late emperor, for elucidation or proofs of this point. They found, indeed, many letters from the king of Prussia; but in a strain absolutely different from what they apprehended. The king of Prussia had, as far as prudence would admit, kept a reserve and distance in regard to the rash advances of this unhappy ally. Too experienced to be carried away by his inconsiderate impetuosity, he gave him much salutary, though fruitless, advice. He counselled him to undertake nothing against the empress his consort; to desist from the war with Denmark; to attempt no changes in the religion and fundamental laws of the country; and to lay aside all thoughts of coming into Germany.

On hearing these letters read, the empress is said to have burst into tears of gratitude, and made, in consequence, the strongest declarations in favour of this prince. Nor were they without effect. Orders had been given with relation to Prussia, which threatened a renewal of hostilities; but these were soon countermanded. The army of the Russians was, indeed, separated from that of Prussia; but all the important places, which the Russians had, with so much bloodshed, and through so many difficulties, acquired, and which gave them the command of every thing else that remained to the king, were instantly restored. An immediate end was likewise put to the war between Prussia and Denmark; and every thing in relation to Holstein replaced upon its former footing.

Having thus given a concise and, I hope, a faithful account of the revolutions in Russia, I shall now proceed to relate the transactions of the war as it was carried on in Germany.

In the beginning of the year, the Austrian and Prussian armies continued very quiet in their winter quarters: but prince Henry, who conducted the troops in Saxony, extended his forces, in January, by driving the Imperial army to a greater distance, and occupying Naumberg, Zeitz, Altenburg, and Gera. On the other hand, the Imperial and Saxon troops dislodged the Prussians in February, from the post of Lamatch, and destroyed the magazine which had been transported thither from Magdeburg. In the beginning of May, this active prince suddenly crossing the Mulda in three columns, at Roswin, Dolbeling, and Leisnig, attacked the left wing of the Imperial and Austrian army; on which occasion, general Zetwitz was taken with twelve officers, fifteen hundred men, and three piece

What seemed to confirm this suspicion, was his omitting formally to declare his son, the grand duke Paul Petrowitz, his successor. This omission in a country where the succession is established and regular, would have been of no consequence: the punctual observance of such a ceremony would have betrayed some doubt of the title. But the nature of this government, as well as positive constitutions, had made it necessary in Russia, and the omission of it was certainly alarming.

That unfortunate prince having, in this manner, affronted his army, irritated his clergy, offended the nobility, and alienated his own family, without having left himself any firm ground of authority, in personal esteem, or national prejudices, proceeded with his usual precipitation to new changes. In the mean time a most dangerous conspiracy was forming against him. The cruel punishments, inflicted in Russia on state criminals, tend only the more to harden the minds of men already fierce and obdurate, and seldom deter them from the most desperate undertakings. Rosamowski, Hetman or chief of the Cossacks, a person of importance by that command, Panin, governor of the great duke Paul, marshal Buterlin, the chamberlain Teplow, the attorney-general Glebow, baron Orlow, major of the guards, and many other of the great officers and first nobility of the empire, engaged in a conspiracy to dethrone the Czar, who was now universally hated; and what was more fatal to him, universally despised.

They assured themselves that their project could not be disagreeable to the empress; whose conduct had always been the very reverse of that of her consort. This princess, finding that the affections of her husband were irrecoverably alienated, endeavoured to set up a separate and independent interest in her own favour, and for asserting the rights of her son. She therefore assiduously cultivated the affections of the Russian nation, and paid a respect to their manners and religion, in the same degree as her husband seemed to condemn both.

So ill was the Czar served, that this conspiracy was grown general, without his receiving the least notice of it; and he remained in perfect security, while the senate and the clergy were assembled to pass the sentence of his deposition. At this time the empress and he were both absent from the capital at different country-seats. The empress was no sooner informed that the design was ripe for execution, than she got on horseback, and repaired with all possible speed to Petersburg. She immediately harangued the guards, who cheerfully and unanimously declared in her favour, and proclaimed her empress of Russia, independently of her husband. She then addressed herself to the clergy, and the chief of the nobility, who applauded her resolution; and all orders immediately took the oath of allegiance to her as sole empress. No sooner was she acknowledged in this manner, than, without losing a moment's time, she marched from Petersburg towards the emperor, at the head of a body of troops.

This prince was indulging himself in indolent amusements, and lulled in the most profound security at a house of pleasure, called Oraniebaum, on the sea-shore, when a soldier brought him an account that his kingdom was taken away from him.

Astonished, and wholly unprepared for this event, he was some time senseless, and intirely at a loss what part to take. When finally aroused from this trance by the approaching danger, his first resolution was to defend the place with his Holstein guards; but, though satisfied of their attachment, he doubted their strength, and he knew it was in vain to hope for any effort in his favour from the Russians.

Nothing then remained but flight, by which he might escape to Holstein, and wait some favourable turn of fortune. This late lord of powerful fleets and armies embarked in a small vessel, with a few attendants, and rowed towards Cronstadt; but he had not proceeded very far, when he was informed that this fortress was in the hands of his enemies, and that every avenue for escape was shut against him. Dejected and desponding, he returned to Oraniebaum. After some short and tumultuous deliberation, he resolved to abandon all thoughts of defence, and to throw himself on the compassion of the empress.

On her march she met his messengers, who brought letters containing a renunciation of the empire, and stipulating no other terms than leave to return to Holstein, and the satisfaction of taking with him, as the companions of his retreat, the countess of Woronzoff and one single friend.

Reasons of state could not permit the empress to consent to the first of those terms; and the last she considered as an insult on her honour. His terms were rejected; and he was required to sign an unconditional resignation of his crown, according to a form that was prepared for him. Not satisfied with depriving him of his crown, they even resolved to make him the murderer of his own reputation; and this unfortunate prince, moved with the vain hope of life, signed a paper, declaring his conviction of his inability to govern the empire, either as a sovereign, or in any other capacity, and his sense of the distress, in which his continuing at the head of affairs would inevitably involve it. After he had signed this abdication, he gave up his sword, and was conducted to prison, where, in a short time, but according to what had been universally expected, he died. The disorder, which killed him, was called an hemorrhoidal cholic.

In the beginning of May, this active prince suddenly crossing the Mulda in three columns, at Roswin, Dolbeling, and Leisnig, attacked the left wing of the Imperial and Austrian army; on which occasion, general Zetwitz was taken with twelve officers, fifteen hundred men, and three piece pieces of cannon. After this exploit, the prince took possession of Freyberg, where he found a considerable magazine. In the beginning of June, an attempt was made upon his out posts by the Austrians, who had been reinforced for that purpose; but they were repulsed with considerable loss.

About the same time the king of Prussia assembled the main body of his army in the neighbourhood of Breslau; while that of the Austrians, under count Daun, occupied several strong eminences, that enabled him to communicate with Schweidnitz, which was considered as the king's chief object.

Towards the latter end of June, the Russian troops under general Czernichew, passing the Oder, joined the Prussian army, in consequence of the late treaty between the king and the Czar Peter. Thus reinforced, his majesty took possession of the heights of Sackwitz; and this motion constrained count Daun to withdraw in the night to the hills of Kuntzendorff. The king continued to advance, and drove the Austrians from several hills; but his attack upon the hill of Engel, defended by general Brentano, proved ineffectual. Count Daun however, thought proper to decamp from Kuntzendorff, and take post at Tanhausen, in order to secure his magazine at Friedland, and maintain his communication with Bohemia, into which the Prussian general Weid actually penetrated with a detachment, as far as Weisse. Marshal Daun no sooner abandoned the hills of Kuntzendorff, than they, together with the heights of Ziesken and Justenstein, were occupied by the Prussian forces. In the midst of these transactions, many skirmishes were fought with various success; by detached parties, which traversed the open country in Austria, Silesia, and Moravia, as well as in Bohemia.

The king of Prussia did not long enjoy the assistance of his new allies. The revolution in Russia was no sooner effected, than orders arrived in the allied camp from Petersburg for the Russians to separate themselves from his army, and return immediately to their own country. The king, without being confounded by this sudden event, and instead of slackening his efforts on account of this desertion, resolved to fall with vigour, and without delay, upon marshal Daun, and to attack him before the news of this change could reach him. Since he could no longer profit by the arms of the Russians, he endeavoured to profit at least by their appearance in his camp. The very next day, therefore, he attacked the Austrian army, whose right wing occupied the heights of Buckersdorff, drove them from that eminence, and from some villages where they were advantageously posted. The success was not owing only to the spirit of the actual attack, but to an apprehension of the Austrians, that the whole united army of the Prussians and Muscovites was on the point of engaging them. The king of Prussia made an use of those allies, in the moment they deserted him.

This lively attack was made with the loss of only three hundred men on the side of the Prussians: the number of the Austrians killed is not known. The prisoners amounted to one thousand: and fourteen pieces of cannon were taken. It was indeed no more than an affair of posts; but its consequences were important; for the communication of the Imperialists with Schweidnitz was now entirely and finally cut off: they could not attempt any thing considerable for the relief of that place. Prince Henry held them in continual alarm for Bohemia; and a great part of their attention, and no small part of their forces, were kept constantly engaged on that side. The king of Prussia, having thus pushed back marshal Daun, invested Schweidnitz, and laid siege to that important fortress before his face. In the night between the seventh and eighth of August, the trenches were opened, and the operations of the siege carried on with such vigour, that by the fourteenth, nine batteries played against the town. Schweidnitz was undoubtedly strong, both by nature and art, and moreover defended by a garrison of nine thousand men, who exerted themselves with courage and activity: but such was the determined resolution of the besieger, and so formidable was the provision he had made for this enterprize, that the Austrian general thought it necessary to make some bold attempt to disturb him in his operations. The Prussian infantry were encamped on the heights behind Schweidnitz. The cavalry formed a chain in the plains of Keintzendorff, extending to a detached corps, under the prince of Wirtemberg, so situated as to prevent any interruption from the county of Glatz; and the prince of Bevern commanded a strong body advantageously posted near Cassel.

These dispositions were made to protect the convoys as well as to frustrate any attempts which might be made for the relief of Schweidnitz. On the sixteenth day of August, the Austrian generals Laudohn, O'Donnel, and Beck, were detached with thirty-three battalions, and eighteen regiments of cavalry, to attack the post of the prince of Bevern, and they executed their orders with great celerity and resolution: but the prince, being upon his guard, maintained his ground without flinching, until the king arrived in person, with eight battalions of infantry, and a strong body of dragoons and hussars. These falling upon the Austrian cavalry, soon routed them with considerable slaughter, upon which Laudohn desisted from his attack, and retreated towards Silberberg, with the loss of two thousand men killed or taken by the enemy.

After this victory the king returned to the siege, which he prosecuted with redoubled vigour; while general Gualco, who commanded the garrison, with the assistance of two able engineers, left no step untaken which could retard his progress. Repeated sallies were made with considerable effect; mines were sprung, breaches repaired, and the fire from the ramparts was maintained with great spirit and perseverance. Count Daun found it impracticable to take any effectual measures for the relief of this fortress; yet in Saxony, the Imperial and Austrian troops under general Haddick, by three successive attacks upon the Prussian posts, compelled prince Henry to abandon Zwickau, Chemnitz, and Wilsdruff. Encouraged by this gleam of success, he made an attempt upon the front of the prince's army; but met with a severe repulse.

In the night, between the eighth and ninth of October, the besiegers of Schweidnitz sprung a mine; in consequence of which, great part of the wall was thrown into the ditch, and a disposition was was made for a general assault. In this emergency general Guasco, considering it would be madness any longer to think of resistance, ordered the command to be beat, and surrendered himself and his garrison, to the number of eight thousand men, prisoners of war. This siege is said to have lasted the longer, as the attack was conducted, and the defence made, by two engineers, who had written on the attack and defence of places; and they were now practically engaged to prove the superiority of their several systems.

The king, having taken possession of this fortress, which had four times changed masters since the commencement of the war, sent a strong reinforcement to his brother in Saxony, and returned to his former quarters at Peterswald. Before this reinforcement arrived, the prince of Stolberg and general Haddick attacked the Prussian general Belling, who was posted in the wood of Kats, from whence he was dislodged after two successive actions, in which a great number were slain on both sides. The Prussians, after a most obstinate defence, were not only driven from the wood, but also compelled to abandon Freyberg, with the loss of nine pieces of cannon, seven colours, a considerable quantity of stores, and about a thousand men taken prisoners, exclusive of those who were killed in the action. The victors having taken possession of Freyberg, general Haddick repaired to Dresden.

Their triumph was of no long continuance. On the twenty-ninth day of October, prince Henry of Prussia, even before the arrival of the reinforcement from Silesia, attacked the Imperial and Austrian forces under the command of prince Stolberg. The action began at day-break, and lasted till two in the afternoon, when the enemy being thrown into irreparable disorder, abandoned the field of battle and the town of Freyberg, with the loss of five thousand prisoners, thirty cannon, and many colours and standards. They withdrew to Plauen, complaining that they were betrayed by the perfidy of a superior officer, who had, during the whole campaign, discovered their dispositions to the Prussian general. He was at last detected by an intercepted letter, directed to general Kleist, and conveyed under a strong guard from Dippoldswalde to Dresden. In the beginning of November, the king of Prussia joined his brother in Saxony, leaving a strong garrison in Schweidnitz, under the command of major-general Knoblock, and his army in Silesia, to the conduct of the prince of Bevern, whose camp formed a chain on the mountains from Steinfelsendorff to Borsdorff, while part of the cavalry encamped on the plain. General Werner was detached with a small corps into the Upper Silesia. As for marshal Daun, he sent a large detachment into the same country, and reinforced the Austrian troops in Saxony, he himself remaining at Scharffnick, in the county of Glatz. Immediately after the victory at Freyberg, a detachment of Prussians, under the command of general Kleist, made an incursion into Bohemia, laying waste the country to the very gates of Prague, and destroyed several Austrian magazines of great value.

The court of Vienna, alarmed by the success of this partisan, was glad to agree to a suspension of hostilities, proposed by the king of Prussia, for the respective armies in Silesia, to continue in force during the winter. This being accordingly concluded, the Austrian and Imperial troops retired into their winter quarters, in hope of enjoying some repose, which, however, was of a very short duration.

General Kleist immediately advanced at the head of a strong body of forces into Franconia, where he obliged a great number of men to enlist in the king's service, and laid the whole country under exorbitant contributions. From the city of Nuremberg alone, they are said to have exacted to the amount of two hundred thousand pounds sterling. The king, being resolved on these measures, had declared by his minister to the diet assembled at Ratisbon, that as all his former remonstrances to the states of the empire had produced no effect, he was determined to employ more effectual means to make them recall their troops from the Austrian army: that he had ordered one body of his forces to enter Franconia; another to take the route of Suabia; and a third to penetrate into Bavaria: that they should every where conduct themselves according to the exigencies of war: but that the diet of the empire should not be disturbed. It has been supposed, that, in these incursions, the Prussians raised a sum equal to the annual subsidy, which had formerly been paid by Great-Britain to their sovereign.

In Westphalia the war was prosecuted with great spirit and activity. The design of the enemy was to keep possession of Hesse, and extend their conquests into the electorate of Hanover, where they were still masters of Goettingen, which they had been at great pains and expence to fortify. The business of prince Ferdinand was to stop their progress, and if possible drive them back to the banks of the Mayne.

In the beginning of March, before the armies began their operations, a detachment of four thousand men from the French garrison of Goettingen, made a forced march to the posts of Gittel and Kahlfeldt, in hope of surprising the east chain of the allied cantonments; but the troops withdrew from these places so seasonably, that the enemy could only make a small impression on their rear, and next day returned to their quarters. Immediately after this attempt, the east chain of the allies was strengthened by a reinforcement of three thousand men, who took post at Eimbeck.

In April, general Luckner, a famous Hanoverian partisan, gained a considerable advantage over the marquis de Lortange, who had marched out of Goettingen, at the head of eighteen hundred horse and two thousand infantry, to intercept the other in one of his excursions: but Luckner, being apprised of his design, procured a strong reinforcement of horse, with which he attacked the marquis unexpectedly, and obliged him to retire into Goettingen with great precipitation and no small loss. About the same time major Witzingerode, commander of the Hessian hussars, made a party of French irregulars prisoners at Eichsfeld. In the course of the same month, the hereditary prince of Brunswick, at the head of a strong detachment, with a train of artillery, laid siege to the castle of Arensburg situated on one of the heads of the Roer, which the French had occupied, in order to maintain a communication between their forces on the Rhine, and those they had upon the Weser. In a few hours after the batteries of the besiegers began to play, the castle was set on fire, and the flames raged with such violence, that Monsieur de Muret, with his garrison of two hundred and thirty men, were obliged to leap over the walls, and surrender at discretion. After this exploit, the prince made a progress as far as Elvervelt and Solingen, in the neighbourhood of Dusseldorp, and met with considerable success in levying recruits and contributions.

The French generals, Soubise and d'Etrees, arriving at Franckfort in April, assembled their forces in May, on the banks of the Weser, while the prince of Condé conducted a separate army at Dusseldorp, on the Lower Rhine. Prince Ferdinand, with the main body of the allies, lay encamped behind the Dymel, to make head against the two marshals; the hereditary prince was posted with a considerable corps, in the bishopric of Munster, to observe the motions of the prince of Condé; and general Luckner, with a third detachment, encamped near Eimbecke on the Leine, to watch prince Xavier of Saxony, who had taken post with a corps de reserve, between the river Werra and the town of Gottingen. The French camp of the marshals being situated between Graebenstein and Meinbrexten, prince Ferdinand made a disposition for attacking them on the twenty-fourth day of June; and the plan was immediately put in execution. General Luckner, leaving his Hessian hussars to amuse prince Xavier and conceal his route, set out from Hollenstadt on the twenty-third in the morning, crossed the Weser in the evening, and by three o'clock next morning arrived between Mariendorff and Udenhausen. At four general Sporcken passed the Dymel at Sielem, with twelve battalions of Hanoverians, and part of the cavalry of the left wing, and advanced between Nombrexten and Udenhausen, with a view to fall upon the enemy's flank at Carlsdorff, while Luckner should attack them in the rear. At the same time prince Ferdinand, passing the river with twelve British battalions, eleven of the Brunswick troops, eight regiments of Hessians, with the English cavalry, and part of the German horse of the left wing, drew them up, in order, behind the ponds of Kasse. The vanguard on the left was composed of the piquets of the army, and that on the right of the chasseurs of the English and German infantry, commanded by lord Frederick Cavendish, and Freytag's Hanoverian chasseurs, who had orders to occupy the mountain of Langenberg. The marquis of Granby, who conducted the body of the reserve, crossed the Dymel at Warburg, and proceeded by Zieremberg and Ziebershausen, to an eminence opposite to Furstenwalde, in order to fall upon the left wing of the enemy. These preparations were made with so much judgment, celerity, and good order, that the French had not perceived the approach of the allies, when they found themselves attacked with infinite impetuosity in front, flank, and rear. Confounded at this unexpected assault, they thought of nothing but a retreat, which they immediately began, and which, considering the ardour with which they were attacked, would in all probability have ended in a total rout, had not Mr. de Stainville, at the head of a chosen body, sacrificed them to the safety of the army. This gallant officer threw himself into the woods of Willemstahl, with the grenadiers of France, the royal grenadiers, the regiment of Aquitaine, and some other troops that constituted the flower of the French infantry. With these he made a noble stand, effectually covering the retreat of the marshals, who retired under the cannon of Cassel, and part of their forces passed the Fulda in the utmost precipitation. Lord Granby attacked the troops of Stainville with his usual impetuosity; and the whole body was either killed or taken, except two battalions that found means to escape. Upon this occasion the number of prisoners amounted to two thousand seven hundred and fifty, including one hundred and sixty-two officers, together with some standards and colours; while the loss of the victors did not exceed three hundred men, and no British officer of distinction lost his life, except colonel Townshend, who had behaved with great gallantry in this and several other actions since the commencement of the war.

Every thing in the conduct of prince Ferdinand appears the effect of a well digested plan; and one great action completed always helps to disclose a series of bold, masterly, and connected designs.

While the French army lay in their strong camp, under the cannon of Cassel, prince Ferdinand determined, if possible, to cut off their communication with Franckfort, which was at present preserved by Mr. de Rochambeau, who had occupied a strong post near Homburg, with a body of horse and some brigades of infantry. The marquis of Granby and lord Frederick Cavendish advanced to dislodge him at the head of the British grenadiers, two regiments of English cavalry, four Hanoverian squadrons, the chasseurs of the infantry, and the hussars of Bauer and Riedesel. The enemy beginning to retreat as they approached, the marquis ordered his horse to attack their rear, and this service was gallantly performed by the regiment of blues and Elliot's dragoons, led on by the colonels Hervey and Erskine: but the French cavalry suddenly facing about, and falling upon them sword in hand, with great resolution, they must have been overpowered by superior numbers, had not the infantry come up to their assistance. Then the French cavalry retired, and were hard pressed by the British grenadiers and Highlanders; so that they must have been entirely routed, had not they been supported by their infantry, which had taken post in a hollow way. At length they accomplished their retreat, with the loss of about four hundred men; while the hussars of Bauer and Riedesel, advancing to Rothemburg, set fire to a considerable magazine which the enemy had there collected.

In the month of July, prince Ferdinand formed a design of attacking the French marshals in their camp at Melsungen, to which place they had withdrawn in order to maintain their communication with Franckfort, and to facilitate their junction with the prince de Condé, who had orders to advance from the Lower Rhine for that purpose. The general of the allied army, having made an excellent disposition for attacking the enemy, crossed the Eder on the twenty-fifth, and joined the marquis of Granby on the heights of Falkenberg; but examining the situation of the enemy, he found them too advantageously posted to to attack them with any prospect of success. Observing, however, that there were signs of confusion among them, he advanced in columns, and forming at eight in the evening, began to cannonade their camp. At night he retired and repassed the rivers Schwalm and Eder, leaving the marquis on the heights of Falkenberg. At the same time the enemy crossed the Fulda, and leaving a body of troops under Mr. de Guerchy, opposite to the camp which they abandoned, they withdrew towards Cassel, while the marquis of Granby took possession of the post of Melsungen. Thus their communication with Frankfort seemed to be once more cut off. Their conduct at this period appears to have been equally imprudent and irresolute. They sustained a new check in the misfortune of Mr. de Stainville, who, advancing with four regiments of dragoons towards Rothenburn, fell into an ambuscade at Morschen, where his troops were routed and dispersed by a body of troops, under the command of general Freytag. They now relinquished Goettingen, after having destroyed the fortifications of the place, which they themselves had erected at a very great expence. They sent repeated orders to the prince of Condé, to join them without delay; and, in the mean time, secured themselves in a strong camp on the banks of the Fulda; while prince Ferdinand laid bridges over that river, as if he intended to seize the first opportunity of hazarding another battle.

On the sixteenth of July, the prince of Condé began his march from Coesfeldt, in order to join the marshals, and passed the Lippe at Halteren; but was obliged to take a large circuit, in which he was constantly followed by the hereditary prince of Brunswick, at the head of a strong body detached from the allied army.

On the thirtieth day of August, being informed that a large body of the enemy were on their march to join the prince of Condé on the heights of Joannesberg, he determined to attack him before the junction could be effected. At first his success was answerable to his own expectations, and the courage of his troops. He drove the enemy entirely from the high grounds into the plain; but while he pursued his advantage, the body he attacked was reinforced by the main army. The action, which began so favourably for the allies, ended in a defeat. They lost about three thousand men in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The hereditary prince, who had, through the whole action, made the most powerful efforts, and exposed himself to the greatest dangers, received a wound from a musket-ball in his hip-bone, from which his life was, for a long time, doubtful, and his recovery lingering and tedious. Whilst his life continued in danger, the concern was universal, and common to both armies; both taking an interest in the preservation of a prince, as much endeared by his humanity, as admired for his valour and military genius.

A victory of the greatest importance could not have more fully displayed the superiority of prince Ferdinand's capacity, in the conduct of a war, than his measures after this defeat. The French were not suffered to derive the smallest advantage from their victory; nor did the allies lose a foot of ground.

As prince Ferdinand seemed to have a design upon Cassel, where the French marshals had left general Diesbach with a numerous garrison; the prince of Condé attempted to open march-routes towards Frankberg, on the Eder, through which he intended to turn the right of the allied army, passing by the country of Waldeck. Through these very roads prince Ferdinand advanced to Wetter, which was abandoned by the French garrison, and the prince of Condé was obliged to pass the Lahne. Then the allied army proceeded to the Ohme, and took possession of the camp at Kirchayne, extending to Ernesthausen, while general Luckner occupied Frankenberg on the Upper Eder. The French marshals having endeavoured, in vain, to interrupt his march, between Horloff and Ohme, crossed the Lahne in the neighbourhood of Gießen, and encamped near Marburgh: the prince of Condé took post at Gosfeln and general Levis at Wetter: but this last was dislodged, and his place occupied by a detachment under the generals Luckner and Conway. Many posts were disputed on both sides with uncommon resolution. The general of the allies had determined to undertake the siege of Cassel; and the enemy made repeated efforts to throw fresh supplies into the place; but they were effectually prevented by the disposition of his forces.

Part of the French army, under the generals de Castries and Saarsfeldt, was posted on one side of the Ohme; and on the other, opposite to them, was a strong detachment of the allies, commanded by the marquis of Granby and general Zastrow, in the neighbourhood of the castle of Amenebourg, which the allies furnished with a garrison of about seven hundred men, under the conduct of captain Cruse. The enemy resolved to make themselves masters of this fortress; and in order to amuse the allies, attacked a post which they occupied at the Brucker-muhl, for the defence of a bridge over the Ohme. It was defended by a detachment of two hundred men, the greatest part of whom were posted in a small redoubt they had raised for the purpose. On the twenty-first day of September, about six in the morning, the weather being extremely foggy, the enemy attacked the post at the Brucker-muhl with musquetry and some pieces of cannon, having stationed a body of horse and infantry on the eminence beyond the bridge. A cannonade immediately began on both sides, while a warm dispute with small arms was maintained between the assailants and the Hanoverians, who defended the redoubt. General Waldegrave, being ordered to sustain this party at the Brucker-muhl, detached the first battalion of British guards to relieve the Hanoverians, who had by this time suffered great loss, and expended all their ammunition. The enemy continuing to throw fresh troops into a small work, which they had beyond the bridge, and to bring up more cannon; prince Ferdinand also reinforced his artillery with six large cannon, and three howitzers from the army; and four Hessian battalions advanced to support those who were engaged. Both sides fought with the most determined resolution, and a prodigious fire of artillery and small arms was maintained for fifteen hours, without intermission; yet no attempt was made on either side to pass the bridge. At length the darkness put an end to the action, which cost the allies about six hundred men in killed and wounded. The loss of the enemy was much more considerable.
six

They likewise began to detach some parties on the right and left of the allied army, in order to open their communication with Cassel; but all their efforts were rendered ineffectual by the vigilance and activity of the allied generals, who obtained several advantages over them, between the twenty-seventh of September and the first day of October, when prince Ferdinand's quarters were still at Kirchayn, his army extending on the right to Watzenbach, and on the left, behind Merlan. The marshals of France had their right at Merlan, and their left at Caldern. This was the period at which the siege of Cassel was undertaken. The trenches were opened on the sixteenth day of October; and the operations prosecuted with such vigour, that, notwithstanding the activity and resolution of a very numerous garrison, commanded by the baron de Diesbach, they were obliged to capitulate on the first day of November, and marched out with all the honours of war. Prince Ferdinand intended to have finished his operations with the siege of Ziegenhayn, which was the only place in Hesse now possessed by a French garrison; but his preparations were interrupted by the cessation of arms, which took place immediately after the signing of the preliminaries of the peace between France and Great Britain.

This campaign, though not distinguished by any great decisive victory, was not less honourable, than any of the former, to the commander or the troops. A connected series of judicious and spirited operations produced all the effects which could have been proposed from a single and brilliant stroke. At this time, the French, after having, for six years, exerted almost the whole undivided strength of their monarchy upon this single object, were, in the end, very little more advanced, than they were the day they first set their foot in Germany. The possession of three or four poor unimportant places was all they had purchased by many millions of treasure expended, and possibly near two hundred thousand lives thrown away. The whole body of the allies acquired great and just glory in this war; but the English had all along the post of honour, and obtained the highest reputation. As to their commander, prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, having begun his operations almost without an army, having continued the war with an army always inferior in numbers, having experienced every variety of fortune, his capacity and his firmness carried him with credit through all; and enabled him to conclude the war with a triumphant superiority. He may now enjoy, in the honourable repose, which his exploits have purchased for himself and his country, the best of rewards, the consciousness of having merited and obtained the approbation of the public. Posterity will consider him as the deliverer of Germany.

Having now concluded the account of the transactions of the war on the continent of Europe, I shall next describe the exploits of the British arms by sea, during the course of the year.

In the month of December of last year, an unsuccessful attempt was made by the enemy, to burn the British ships of war at anchor in the road of Basque. They provided three fire-vessels, which being chained together, were towed out of the port, but the wind luckily shifting, drove them clear off the ships they were intended to destroy. They continued burning some time, after having blown up with a terrible explosion, and every person on board perished.

In the beginning of April, captain Gambier, commander of the Burford, arrived at Plymouth with a large French East-India ship from the isle of Bourbon, laden with coffee and pepper, which had been taken by one of Sir George Pococke's squadron, in the Chops of the Channel.

In May, two British frigates, cruising off Cape St. Vincent, made prize of the Hermione, a Spanish register-ship, bound from Lima to Cadiz, loaded with treasure and valuable effects, by which all the captors were enriched. Her cargo amounted to about one million sterling, which was considerably more than had ever been before taken in any one bottom; and the loss of so much treasure in the beginning of such an expensive war, must have been a severe stroke on the court of Madrid. The prize was brought from Gibraltar to England, and the gold and silver being conveyed in covered waggons to London, was carried in procession to the Bank amidst the acclamations of the people, who considered it as an happy omen of success in the war with Spain, against which the nation was enraged to a remarkable degree of animosity.

About the latter end of May, intelligence being received that a French squadron under the command of Mr. de Ternay had escaped from Brest in a fog, and its destination being uncertain, Sir Edward Hawke, with the duke of York, as rear-admiral, sailed from Spithead with seven ships of the line, and two frigates, in hopes of falling in with the enemy; but, after having visited the coast of France, and cruised for some time in the Chops of the Channel for the protection of the trade, they returned to Portsmouth, without having seen Mr. de Ternay. He had been discovered however, on the eleventh day of May, about fifty leagues to the south-west of the Lizard, by captain Rowley, who had sailed with three ships of war as convoy to a fleet of merchant-ships bound to the East and West-Indies, and the continent of America. Captain Rowley, though inferior in strength to the enemy, no sooner observed them to windward, than he made a disposition for battle, and lay to, waiting their approach. They accordingly bore down upon him: then he hoisted British colours, and fired at the nearest, when she was within little more than random shot. They immediately hoisted English ensigns, and tacked to the northward. He gave them chace till three in the afternoon, when they were scarcely in sight; but having no hope of overtaking them, he now discontinued the pursuit and rejoined his convoy.

The French commander steered his course to Newfoundland, and, on the twenty-fourth day of June, entered the bay of Bulls, where he landed some troops without opposition. Having taken possession of an inconsiderable settlement in that bay, they advanced to the town of St. John's, which being in no condition of defence, was surrendered upon capitulation. One company of soldiers, which composed the garrison of the fort, were made prisoners of war, together with the officers and crew of his majesty's sloop the Gramont, mont, which was in the harbour. They also took several other vessels, demolished many stages erected for curing cod, and did considerable injury to the English fishers, and settlers on different parts of the coast. The ministry were no sooner apprized of this trifling loss, which it was impossible either to foresee or prevent, than they took measures for retrieving the damage which the nation had sustained; and this petty triumph of the enemy was of a very short duration. The armament equipped in England for retaking Newfoundland, was rendered unnecessary by the vigilance and activity of Sir Jeffery Amherst and lord Colville, who commanded by land and sea in North-America.

On the thirty-first day of August, the Hunter sloop of war, one of Admiral Moore's cruisers, falling in with four Dutch merchant-ships in the channel, under convoy of a frigate of thirty-six guns, the English captain prepared to examine the lading of the Dutch vessels, when the commander of the frigate interposing, declared he would not suffer any such search to be made. The other insisting upon the examination, but being prevented by superior force, made a signal to the Diana and Chester ships of war, which happened to be in sight, and they advanced accordingly. After some expostulation, the Dutch captain continuing obstinate, the Diana fired a gun to bring him to, and he returned a whole broadside. An engagement immediately ensued, and was maintained with great spirit for about fifteen minutes, when the Dutchman thought proper to submit, having lost his own nose, and nine or ten men in the action. He was brought into the Downs, together with his convoy, which were found laden with contraband merchandize from Havre to Brest.

In the beginning of September the Zephyr, a French frigate of thirty-two guns, bound to Newfoundland, with troops, artillery, stores, and ammunition, was taken in the Chops of the Channel by the Lion ship of war, after an engagement of two hours, in which she had about thirty men killed and wounded.

In the month of November, a French ship mounted with twenty cannon, bound from Bourdeaux to Cape Francois, on the island of Hispaniola, was taken by captain Ruthven, nephew to the earl of Bute, commander of the Terpsichore, after a sharp action, in which he himself was wounded. In the course of the same month, the Oiseau, another French frigate of twenty-six guns, commanded by the chevalier De Modene, was taken by captain Tonyn of the king's ship the Brune, about seven leagues from Carthage. The engagement was maintained, for some time, with great courage on both sides; but at length the chevalier was obliged to submit, having lost about thirty men, including all his officers, except three, who with himself were wounded in the action.

A third French frigate, called the Minerve, was wrecked in the harbour of Villa-franca, through the pride, precipitation, and ignorance of her commander. She had, in company with four French ships of war, given chase to the Sheerness, an English frigate commanded by captain Clarke, from Gibraltar, who took refuge in the harbour of Villa-franca, and there anchored, the wind blowing high. He was immediately followed by the enemy, when the captain of the Minerve, actuated by an idle spirit of vanity and insolence, resolved to get between him and the shore, and ran his ship upon the rocks that formed the eastern side of the harbour. Being himself ignorant of the art of navigation, and ill seconded by a crew little acquainted with such emergencies, his ship was in a short time dashed in pieces; and a considerable number of his people perished, notwithstanding all the assistance that could be given him by his consorts. On this melancholy occasion captain Clarke, forgetting they were enemies, and that their present calamity was the effect of their enmity to him and his country, generously followed the dictates of humanity, and exerted his utmost endeavours for their relief. He sent his boats manned to their assistance, and actually saved the lives of the greater part of their company: an instance of unbounded benevolence, for which he was thanked in person by the French commodore.

About the end of August, captain Hotham, of the Æolus, chased two Spanish ships into the bay of Aviles, in the neighbourhood of Cape Pinas; and on the second day of September, entering the bay, he dropped anchor in such a situation, as to bring his guns to bear, not only upon one of the ships, but also upon a small battery situated upon an eminence. After a short contest both the battery and ship were abandoned; but before captain Hotham could take possession of his prize, she ran aground, and bulging, was burned by the captors. She was a large ship bound from the Caracas to Passage, laden with hides and cocoa; the other escaped in the night. On the eleventh of September, Captain Hotham came up with a French squadron, amounting to no less than seven sail, between St. Andero and Bilboa, and kept company with them till the sixteenth, as far to the westward as Cape Finisterre, whence he returned to his station. By a sloop from Bourdeaux, which he took on the twentieth, he learned that this squadron had a body of troops on board for St. Domingo.

The navy of France was by this time reduced to such a small number, that their ministry was obliged to send reinforcements to their settlements abroad, in single ships, some of which were picked up by the British cruisers, particularly one transport containing the best part of a regiment intended to reinforce their colony of Louisiana, which had engrossed their principal attention in America, ever since the loss of Canada.

About the end of September, the duke of York and Sir Charles Hardy set sail once more with a small squadron for the bay of Biscay, in order to intercept the enemy's cruisers; and protect the shipping of Great-Britain on their voyage home from the westward, and after a short cruise returned to Spithead.

The cruisers of Great-Britain were no less active and successful in the seas of America. In the beginning of April captain Ourry of the Actæon, in the latitude of Tobago, took a large Spanish register ship, bound to Lagueira, laden with artillery, stores, and ammunition. In September, a fleet of twenty-five French merchant ships, richly laden with sugar, coffee, and indigo, set sail from Cape Francois for Europe, under convoy of four frigates. Five of these vessels were engaged and taken in the night by some privateers of New-York and Jamaica. Next day the remaining part fell in with commodore Keppel, who made prize of their whole fleet and convoy, which were carried into the harbour of Port-royal in Jamaica.

I proceed now to the progress of the British arms in the East and West-Indies. I have already observed, that, in the beginning of March, an armament had sailed from Portsmouth under the command of the earl of Albemarle and Sir George Pocock; and that, according to the general opinion, it was destined to act against the chief Spanish settlement on the island of Cuba. On the twenty-seventh day of May they were joined off Cape Nicholas, on the northernmost point of Hispaniola, by a detachment of the fleet from Martinico, under Sir James Douglas; and, in consequence of this junction, their whole force amounted to nineteen sail of the line, eighteen smaller ships of war, and about one hundred and fifty transports, having on board about ten thousand land forces and marines. A supply of four thousand men had been ordered from New-York, and was expected to join them very near as early as they could be supposed able to commence their operations.

The admiral, having determined to take the nearest course through the old straits of Bahama, used every possible precaution, and chose the most skilful pilots for conducting the fleet through that difficult and dangerous passage, which lies along the north side of Cuba. He was favoured with a fair wind and good weather, which enabled him to perform this task in about ten days, without accident or danger; and, on the sixth day of July, he lay to, about five leagues to the eastward of the Havanna, after having taken a Spanish frigate and a store-ship in the passage. Having given directions to the masters of the transports, with respect to the landing of the forces, and left commodore Keppel to superintend this service, with six sail of the line and some frigates, he bore away with the rest of the fleet, and ran down off the harbour, where he descried twelve Spanish ships of the line, with several trading vessels. Next morning he disposed his marines in boats, and made a shew of landing about four miles to the westward of the Havanna; while the earl of Albemarle landed with the whole army, between the rivers Boca-nao and Coxemar, about six miles to the eastward of the Moro Castle, which was the enemy's chief fortrefs for the defence of the town and harbour. A body of Spaniards appeared on the shore; but, some sloops being ordered in to scour the beach and the woods with their cannon, the troops not only landed, but also passed the river Coxemar, without opposition. On the tenth, colonel Carleton drove the enemy from a small redoubt on the top of the hill Cavannos, which overlooked the Moro; and there a post was established: at the same time, three bomb-vessels being anchored in shore, began to throw shells into the town, under cover of the ships Stirling Castle and Echo. Though this attack of the English was altogether unexpected, the place being strongly fortified and well supplied, preparations were instantly made for a vigorous defence, by Don Juan de Prado, governor of the city, and the marquis del Real, commodore of the shipping, assisted by the counsels and experience of the viceroy of Peru and the governor of Carthagena, who happened to be at the Havanna, in their way to or from their respective governments. By the twelfth, they had sunk three of their capital ships in the mouth of the harbour, so as entirely to block up the channel. The admiral ordered four ships of the line to cruise in the offing; and, with the rest of his squadron, anchored off Chorrera river, four miles to the westward of the Havanna, where there was plenty of wood and fresh water. Here, at the request of lord Albemarle, he landed eight hundred marines, formed into two battalions, under the majors Campbell and Collins, who encamped on this side, and were reinforced from the other side by a detachment of twelve hundred men, under the command of colonel Howe. This step was taken in order to secure a footing on both quarters of the town, and distract the enemy's attention, so as to weaken the defence of the Moro, which commanded the town, and against which therefore the earl of Albemarle had determined to direct his chief operations. He was encamped in the woods between the river Coxemar and the Moro, leaving a corps at Guanamacoa, under the command of lieutenant-general Elliot, to guard the avenues on that side, and preserve his communication with the country, which, it was hoped, would supply the troops with water, vegetables, and fresh provision. The attack of the Moro was conducted by major-general Keppel, brother to the earl of Albemarle; and the chief engineer was Mr. Mackellar, who had discovered uncommon abilities at the siege of Louisbourg, and on many other occasions both in this and the last war.

Fascines, stores, and artillery, being conveyed from the ships with great expedition by the seamen, the engineers began to erect batteries of bombs and cannon, while a body of pioneers were employed to cut parallels in the woods, and form a line with fascines, to protect the guards from the fire of the enemy, which began to be very troublesome. On the twenty-ninth, about one thousand chosen men of the enemy, with a detachment of armed negroes and mulattoes, landed in two divisions to the right and left of the Moro, in order to demolish the works of the besiegers: but they were repulsed by the piquets and advanced posts, and retreated in great disorder, with the loss of two hundred men, killed or taken.

On the first day of July, the besiegers opened two batteries of cannon, so that their whole fire now proceeded from twelve battering cannon, six large mortars, three small ones, and twenty-six royals. The enemy had seventeen pieces of artillery, and one mortar, mounted on the front attacked: but their fire was neither so vigorously plied, nor so well directed as that of the assailants. Indeed, their attention was this day divided for about three hours, in consequence of an attack made upon the north-east face, by three ships of the line, the Cambridge, Dragon, and Marlborough, commanded by the captains Goostrey, Hervey, and Burnet, who maintained a close cannonade, though with little effect: for the Moro was situated too high to be much affected by their artillery. Their rigging was considerably damaged, and a good number of their men killed, including captain Goostrey, who fell in the beginning of the engagement. His place was supplied by captain Lindsay

A Plan of the SIEGE of the HAVANA, drawn by an OFFICER on the Spot, 1762.

Lindsay of the Trent, a brave officer, who behaved with remarkable gallantry. Captain Campbell, of the Stirling-Castle, who had been ordered to lead until the first ship had been properly placed, did not perform his part according to the directions he had received; and was obliged to quit the service.

About the same time, the admiral's cruisers, who scoured the sea round the whole island, brought in the Venganza frigate of twenty-six guns, the Marté of eighteen, and a schooner, laden with coffee. On the twelfth, Sir James Douglas, who had parted from the admiral immediately after their junction, and steered his course to Jamaica, in a single ship, now arrived off the Havanna, having under his convoy a fleet of merchant ships bound for England.

The parapet of Fort Moro was all of mason-work; the ditch of the front attacked, was seventy feet deep from the edge of the counterscarp, and more than forty feet of that depth sunk in the rock. The soil of the country was so thin, that it was with great difficulty the men could cover themselves in their approaches; and as it was thought necessary to carry on the siege by sap, this method might have been found altogether impracticable, had not Sir James Douglas supplied the engineers with cotton bags, from some ships of his convoy, which were partly loaded with this commodity. Mean while, the enemy made such a vigorous defence, that the siege was protracted beyond expectation; a considerable delay was likewise occasioned by an unlucky accident. On the third day of July, the principal battery of the besiegers, chiefly constructed of timber and fascines, being dried by the heat of the weather and the continual cannonade, took fire, and the flames raged with such violence, that almost the whole work was consumed.

The besiegers laboured under many other discouragements. Epidemical distempers, such as never fail to attack the natives of Britain who visit those countries, began to make great havock, both in the army and the navy. These were rendered more fatal by the want of necessaries and refreshments. The provision was bad; and the troops were ill supplied with water. The great number of the sick rendered the duty more fatiguing to those that were well. In those warm climates, the human body being in a state of relaxation, is incapable of exerting such vigorous efforts as it can make in more northern latitudes: and the men are subject to a species of dejection, which always increases the general mortality: this was now augmented by the delay of the troops from North-America, which they had long expected to no purpose.

At length, on the second day of August, the long wished-for reinforcement arrived; and this circumstance added fresh vigour to the operations of the siege. In a few days, the seamen and soldiers belonging to four of the American transports, which had been wrecked in the streights of Bahama, were brought off in five sloops, detached by the admiral on this service: but, at the same time, he received intelligence that five other transports, having on board three hundred and fifty soldiers, of Anstruther's regiment, and one hundred and fifty provincial troops, were taken on the twenty-first day of July, by a French squadron, which fell in with them near the passage between Maya Guanna, and the North Caicos. All the rest of the troops, however, arrived in perfect health.

On the nineteenth of July, the English made themselves masters of the covered way, before the point of the right bastion, and a new sap was begun at this lodgement. The only place by which the foot of the wall was accessible, happened to be a thin ridge of rock, left at the point of the bastion, to cover the extremity of the ditch, which would otherwise have been open to the sea. Along this ridge the miners passed without cover, to the foot of the wall, where they made a lodgement with little loss. Mean while, they sunk a shaft without the covered way, in order to form a mine for throwing the counterscarp into the ditch, should it be found necessary to fill it; and continued their former sap along the glacis. In the night of the twenty-first, a sergeant and twelve men scaled the walls by surprise; but, the garrison being alarmed before they could be sustained, they were obliged to retreat with precipitation. Next day, at four in the morning, a sally was made from the town, by fifteen hundred men, divided into three detachments, who attacked the besiegers in three different places, while a warm fire was kept up in their favour from the fort of Punta, the west bastion, the lines and flanks of the entrance, and their shipping in the harbour. After a warm dispute, which cost the English about fifty men killed or wounded, all their three parties were repulsed, and fled with such precipitation, that a considerable number was drowned in the hurry of their retreat. Their loss amounted to four hundred, killed and taken prisoners. On the thirtieth day of the month, about two in the morning, a floating battery was towed out into the harbour, and fired with grape-shot and small arms into the ditch, though without any great molestation to the miners; and the close fire of the covering party soon obliged the enemy to retire.

This was the last effort for the relief of the Moro; which, abandoned as it was by the city, and while an enemy was undermining its walls, held out with a sullen resolution, and made no sort of proposal to capitulate. The mines at last did their business. A part of the wall was blown up, and fell into the ditch; leaving a breach, which though very narrow and difficult, the general and engineer judged practicable. The English troops, who were commanded on this most dangerous of all services, rejoiced that it was to be the end of labours which were much more grievous to them. They mounted the breach, entered the fort, and formed themselves with so much celerity, and with such a surprising coolness of resolution, that the enemy, who were drawn up to receive them, and who might have made the assault an affair of great bloodshed, astonished at their countenance, fled on all hands. About four hundred men were slaughtered on the spot, or ran to the water, where they perished. Four hundred more threw down their arms, and obtained quarter. The second in command, the marquis de Gonsales, fell, whilst he was making brave, but ineffectual efforts to animate and rally his people. Don Lewis de Velasco, the governor, who had hitherto defended the fort with such obstinate bravery, seemed resolved, in this extremity, to share the same fate with with it. He collected an hundred men in an intrenchment he had made round his colours; but seeing that all his companions were fled from him, or slaughtered about him, disdaining to fly or call for quarter, he received a mortal wound, and fell, offering his sword to his conquerors. The English wept, with pity and admiration, over that unfortunate valour, which had occasioned them so many toilsome hours, and cost them so many lives.

The reduction of the Moro was not immediately followed by the surrender of the Havanna; on the contrary, the governor of the place now directed his chief fire against the fortress which they had lost; and even sent down a large ship of the line to the entrance of the harbour, from whence she could batter it with more effect. Her efforts, however, proved altogether fruitless, and in a few hours she desisted from the attack. In the mean time, general Keppel, with the advice of the engineer, resolved to erect new batteries on the hill of the Cavannos, on the utmost point of which the fort stands; and a plan was formed for making a new attack to the westward of the town. On the tenth of August, in the morning, the batteries on the Cavannos being finished, the earl of Albemarle, by a message, desired the governor to surrender; and his answer was, that he would defend the place to the last extremity. Next morning, at day-break, about three and forty cannon and twelve mortars began to play against the town and the Punta, which last was silenced before ten; in another hour the north bastion was almost disabled. About two in the afternoon, white flags were hung out all round the place, as well as aboard the admiral's ship in the harbour; and, in a little time, a flag of truce arrived at the head-quarters, with proposals of capitulation. The governor stickled hard to obtain permission to send the ships to Spain, and to have the harbour declared neutral; but neither of these points could be given up, and hostilities were ordered to be renewed, when the enemy thought proper to recede from their demands. By the capitulation, which was signed on the thirteenth, the inhabitants were secured in their private property, in the enjoyment of their own laws and religion; and next day the English troops took possession of this important conquest. As for the Spanish garrison, which was reduced to about seven hundred, including officers, they were indulged with the honours of war; and it was stipulated, that they and the sailors should be conveyed to Old Spain, together with the Spanish commodore, the governor of the Havanna, the viceroy of Peru, and the governor of Carthagená, which two last had not yet left the place. In the progress of the siege, about five hundred of the British troops, including fifteen officers, were killed outright or died of their wounds; and about seven hundred, comprehending thirty-nine officers, were cut off by a distemper, which raged with still greater violence after the reduction of the place. Vast quantities of artillery, small arms, ammunition, and warlike stores, fell into the hands of the conquerors, together with twelve ships of the line, two upon the stocks, and several trading vessels. They likewise acquired to the amount of about three millions sterling, in silver, tobacco, and valuable merchandize, collected on his catholic majesty's account: so that the British nation was more than indemnified for the expence of the expedition; and the enemy's loss was irreparable.

So much treasure intercepted by the English, first in the ship Hermione, and now in the island of Cuba, must have been a severe stroke upon the king of Spain: but the ruin of his navy was of much greater importance, and even that but a trifle in comparison to the loss of the Havanna, the port at which all their galleons and flota, loaded with the riches of Mexico and Peru, rendezvoused in their return to Old Spain; the port which absolutely commanded the only passage by which their ships could sail from the bay of Mexico to Europe.

So lucrative a conquest had never before been made by the English. But this immense capture, though it enriched individuals, contributed nothing directly to the public revenue. It might be said, however, to contribute something to it indirectly; by encreasing the stock of the nation, and supplying that prodigious drain of treasure, which, for several years, had been made from this kingdom, for foreign subsidies, and for the maintenance of armies abroad. If it had not been for such pecuniary supplies, with which the uncommon successes of this war were attended, it never could have been maintained in the extent to which it was carried, notwithstanding the encrease of trade, which had been uniformly progressive for the three preceeding years. It has been, in a loose way, computed, that the success of our arms in the East-Indies, independent of the great increase of valuable merchandize, had brought into England, during the war, near six millions in treasure and jewels. The conquest of the Havanna was not the only instance in which the arms of Great-Britain triumphed over those of Spain in the course of this short war; they were no less successful in another enterprize in the East-Indies.

It may not be improper to inform the reader, that the Philippine islands, in the Indian ocean, extend from the sixth to near the twentieth degree of north latitude, about one hundred and twenty leagues to the southward of China; that they are supposed to be twelve hundred in number, and are considered as part of the sovereignty of Spain; that in the largest of them, called Luconia, which is said to be above one hundred and sixty leagues in length, the Spaniards are possessed of Manilla, a considerable city, extensive, populous, and tolerably well fortified, the centre of the Spanish trade, from whence two large ships are sent annually across the vast Pacific ocean to Acapulco, on the coast of Mexico, laden with the spices, stuffs, jewels, and other rich merchandize of India. The city is situated on a point of land, formed by a river that issues from the great lake of Bahia, and falls into the sea a little lower, at the town of Cavite, where there is a spacious harbour, though the entrance is difficult. The suburbs of Manilla are very extensive, containing a great number of inhabitants, natives of different countries, particularly Chinese; but the number of the Spaniards within the place does not amount to above five thousand.

Against this settlement, a plan of attack was formed at Madras, to be carried into execution by part of the squadron of vice-admiral Cornish, and a few battalions under the command of brigadier dier-general Draper, who had distinguished himself in the defence of Madras, when it was besieged by the enemy. The troops destined for this expedition consisted of one regiment, with a company of the royal artillery; and to these were added, by the governor of Madras, some able officers, about thirty men of the company's artillery, six hundred Sipoy, one company of Caffres, one of Topazes, one of pioneers, two companies of French deserters, with a few hundred of Lascars, for the use of the engineers and the park of artillery. Vice-admiral Cornish supplied a strong battalion of seamen and marines; so that the whole force amounted to two thousand three hundred effective men, with which it was determined to make an attempt upon the flourishing city of Manilla.

Major-general Laurence, who conducted the forces of the East-India company at Madras, gave it as his opinion that the settlements would be in danger, should a greater number of troops be drawn from the coast; and therefore, the two battalions of the company's troops, the whole cavalry, six thousand Sipoy, with part of Monson's regiment, and the highlanders, were left for their defence: at the same time, orders were given, that three ships of war, which they hourly expected at Madras, should remain on that part of the coast for the security of the commerce. The preparations at length being fully completed, captain Grant, in the Sea-horse, was instantly detached to the entrance of the Chinese sea, with instructions to intercept all vessels bound for Manilla, that the enemy might get no information of their design.

The forces, with the stores and artillery, were no sooner embarked, than admiral Cornish sailed in two divisions about the beginning of August, and on the nineteenth arrived at Malacca. Here the fleet being watered, and a large quantity of rattans collected for making gabions, they prosecuted their voyage; and on the twenty-third day of September, anchored in the bay of Manilla, where they found the enemy but ill prepared for a defence, and much alarmed at this unexpected visit. The governor was the archbishop, who assumes the title of captain-general of the Philippine Islands: but the garrison, consisting of eight hundred men of the royal regiment, was commanded by the marquis de Villa-medina, a brigadier-general, who now reinforced it with a body of ten thousand Indians, from the province of Pampanga, a fierce and savage nation, who, though unacquainted with the use of fire-arms, manage their bows and arrows with great dexterity, and are very formidable from their intrepidity and contempt of death.

The admiral, having founded the coast, discovered a convenient place for landing the troops, about two miles to the southward of Manilla. On the twenty-fourth day of September, the proper dispositions being made, and the three frigates, Argo, Sea-horse, and Seaford, stationed very near the shore, to cover the descent; three divisions of the forces were put on board the boats of the fleet, conducted by the sea-captains Parker, Pempenfeldt, and Brereton, and landed at the church and village of Malata, not without some difficulty from a great surf that rolled on the beach. The enemy began to assemble in great numbers, both horse and infantry, to oppose the descent; but the captains, King, Grant, and Peighin, who commanded the covering frigates, poured in such a continued fire of cannon and small-arms, that they soon dispersed; and the general disembarked his troops without the loss of one man; while the Spanish garrison were employed in burning the suburbs of Manilla. Next day the general took possession of the Polverista, a small fort which the enemy had deserted, and which proved an excellent place of arms for covering the landing of the stores and artillery. Colonel Monson, the second in command, with an advanced party of two hundred men, occupied the church of the Hermita, about nine hundred yards from the city. The head-quarters were established in the curate's house, and guarded by the seventy-ninth regiment, of which Mr. Draper himself was colonel, as a post of the utmost consequence, both from its strength, and the commodious cover it afforded from the rains which had deluged the country, and rendered it impossible to form an encampment. The marines were left at the Malata, in the neighbourhood of the Polverista, to secure the communication with the fleet, and protect the stores and artillery, which were not landed without great danger and fatigue. Some boats were overlet, and lieutenant Hardwick perished on this occasion. In the mean time a body of men approached within three hundred yards of the town, and possessed themselves of the church of St. Jago, which they maintained, notwithstanding its being exposed to the fire of the enemy. The battalion of seamen, landing on the twenty-sixth, were cantoned between the seventy-ninth regiment and the marines; and the rest of the company's troops, being disembarked, were likewise put under cover. This day the enemy, to the number of four hundred men, with two field pieces, under the command of the chevalier Fayette, marched up on the right of the English advanced post, the flank of which they began to cannonade: but colonel Monson, at the head of the piquets, and a small reinforcement of marines, soon repulsed them, and obliged them to retire with such precipitation, that they left one of their field-pieces behind them.

The governor had been already twice summoned to surrender, but returned a flat refusal; and, indeed, if the valour of his troops had been equal to the vigour of his declaration, he had but little to fear from an handful of enemies, who, far from being in a condition to invest the city on all sides, were obliged to confine their operations to one corner, leaving two-thirds of it open to all manner of supplies. The front, which the general determined to attack, was secured by the bastions of St. Diego and St. Andrew, a ravelin, which covered the royal gate, a wet ditch, a covered way, and a glacis. The bastions were in good order, furnished with a great number of fine brass cannon: but the ravelin was not armed; nor the covered way in good repair: the glacis was too low, and the ditch was not carried round the capital of the bastion of St. Diego. The breadth of the ditch was about thirty yards, and the depth of water did not exceed five feet. It was founded by a detachment, headed by captain Fletcher, who begged leave to undertake this hazardous enterprise, which he accomplished in the midst of the enemy's fire, with the loss only of three men.

Some straggling seamen having been butchered by the savages, the governor sent out a flag of truce on the twenty-seventh, to apologize for these barbarities, and beg the release of his own nephew, who had been lately taken in the bay, by the boats of the fleet. He had been dispatched in a galley, by the commander of the Galleon Philippina, just arrived from Acapulco, at Cajayagan, near Cape Spirito Santo, with the first advices of the war. Next day, while lieutenant Fryar, with a flag of truce, conducted the prisoner to the town, a detachment of the garrison, intermixed with Indians, sallied out to attack one of the posts of the besiegers; when the savages, without respecting the law of nations, or the sacred character of an officer, under the protection of a flag of truce, fell upon Mr. Fryar, with the most inhuman fury, and murdered him on the spot. They even mangled his body in the most brutal manner, and mortally wounded the Spanish gentleman, who endeavoured to protect his conductor. In their attack, they were soon repulsed by the British party that defended the post, who were so much enraged at their barbarity, that they gave them no quarter.

Mean while several mortars bombarded the town day and night, without intermission; and the engineers were employed in raising some batteries to play upon their works. On the twenty-ninth, the admiral, at Mr. Draper's request, ordered the Elizabeth, commodore Tiddeman, and the Falmouth, captain Brereton, to lie as near the town as the depth of water would allow, and enfilade the enemy's front, with a view to second the operations of the besiegers. They executed this task with great intrepidity; and, although the shallows kept them at too great a distance to answer the purpose effectually, their fire did not fail to throw the inhabitants into the most terrible consternation. On the first and second days of October, the weather was so stormy as to endanger the whole squadron, which lay upon a lee shore. The South-sea Castle store-ship was driven ashore, and, even in that situation, did remarkable service, by enfilading the whole beach to the southward, with her guns, and over-awing a large body of Indians, who threatened an attack on the Polverista, and the magazines of the besiegers at the Malata.

Notwithstanding the storm and heavy rains, the troops and seamen found means to erect batteries of cannon and mortars. They likewise drew a parallel and communication from thence to the advanced post at the church, and established a spacious place of arms on the left of it, near the sea, the roaring of which favoured the workmen in the night, by preventing the noise they made from being heard by the garrison. On the third, the battery being opened against the left face of St. Diego's bastion, was so well served by the seamen and corps of artillery, and the fire so well directed by the conduct and skill of major Barker, that, in a few hours, twelve pieces of cannon mounted on the face of the bastion, were totally silenced, and the enemy compelled to withdraw. At night, a battery was begun of three guns on the left of the place of arms, to silence those that were in barbette, upon the orillon of the St. Andrew bastion, which annoyed the flank of the besiegers. A close fire of grape-shot and musquetry was continued all night, to prevent the enemy from repairing their embrasures, and remounting their cannon; while seven mortars played without intermission, upon the gorge of the bastion, and the neighbouring defences.

On the fourth, the cantonment of the seamen was attacked three hours before day, by a strong body of Indians, encouraged to this attempt by the incessant rains, which, they imagined, had rendered the fire-arms useless. Their approach was facilitated by a number of thick bushes growing on the side of a rivulet, through which they passed in the night, without being observed by the patrols. The alarm was no sooner given, than colonel Monson and captain Fletcher advanced with the piquets to the assistance of the seamen, who had very judiciously kept firm within their posts, contenting themselves with acting on the defensive, until the light should enable them to distinguish friend from foe. The assailants, though armed chiefly with bows and lances, advanced with the most determined countenance to the attack; fought with incredible fury; when repulsed, returned with redoubled rage to the very muzzles of the English muskets; and died like wild beasts, gnawing their bayonets. At day-break, a fresh piquet of the seventy-ninth regiment appearing upon their right flank, they gave way and fled with great precipitation, having lost three hundred men in their attack and retreat.

This party was no sooner repulsed, than another body of them, reinforced by a few of the Spanish troops, made a furious assault upon the church, part of which they at last gained, after having expelled the Sipoys that were there posted. From the top they fired down among the English soldiers, who, though now exposed to a continued shower of bullets and missiles, maintained their post behind the church, without flinching; and, after an obstinate dispute, dislodged the enemy, by the assistance of some field-pieces, and the gallant behaviour of major Fell, captain Fletcher, and other officers sent to their succour. Seventy Spaniards were killed outright; and this, with the former action, cost the besiegers about forty men, including captain Strahan of the seventy-ninth regiment, and lieutenant Porter of the Norfolk, two gallant officers, who lost their lives, and fell universally lamented.

The enemy, confounded by such a severe check, made no further attempts for relieving the place, and the Indians returned to their own habitations. The fire from the garrison diminished apace; and all their defences appeared to be ruined. On the fifth, the fire of the besiegers became so violent, that a considerable breach was effected in the wall; and it was hoped the garrison would demand a capitulation: but they seemed to be obstinate and sullen, without courage or activity: they had not taken care to repair their works; and now they neglected all means of procuring favourable terms, without being resolved to defend the breach; so that the English general made a disposition for storming the town.

On the sixth, at four o'clock in the morning, the troops allotted for this service, marched off from their quarters, in small bodies, to avoid suspicion, and gradually assembling at the church of St. Jago, concealed themselves in the place of arms, and the parallel between the church and the battery, battery. Mean while major Barker maintained a close fire upon the works of the enemy, and those places where they might be lodged or intrenched, the mortars co-operating in the same service. At day-break, a large body of Spaniards was seen drawn up on the bastion of St. Andrew, as if they had received information of the intended assault, and had determined to annoy the assailants with musquetry and grape-shot from the extreme flank of the bastion, where they had still two cannon fit for service; but a few shells falling among them, they fled in confusion. The British troops seized this opportunity, and, directed by the signal of a general discharge from the artillery and mortars, advanced to the assault, under cover of the thick smoke which blew directly on the town.

Lieutenant Ruffel, at the head of sixty volunteers, led the way, being sustained by the grenadiers of the nineteenth regiment, to which he belonged. They were followed by the engineers, with the pioneers, and other workmen, to clear and widen the breach, and make lodgements, in case the enemy should have been found intrenched in the gorge of the bastion. Colonel Monson and major More conducted two grand divisions of the seventy-ninth regiment. The next body that advanced was the battalion of seamen, supported by the other two divisions of the seventy-ninth; and the rear was brought up by the troops of the East-India company. According to colonel Draper's own account, the number of troops with which he entered Manilla amounted to little more than two thousand, composed indifferently of seamen, soldiers, Sipoy, Caffres, Lascars, Topasees, French and German deserters. These assailants mounted the breach with incredible courage and celerity, while the Spaniards on the bastion fled so unexpectedly, that it was strongly suspected they intended to spring mines. The English troops penetrated into the town with very little opposition, except at the royal guard-house, defended by one hundred Spaniards with Indians, who refusing to submit, were instantly cut in pieces. They were likewise considerably galled with shot from the galleries of lofty houses, with which the great square was surrounded. Three hundred of the garrison were drowned in attempting to cross the river, which was deep and rapid; the governor, with the principal magistrates, withdrawing into the citadel. This retreat was in itself imprudent, inasmuch as they took no step towards procuring terms for the citizens, who were accordingly subjected to a severe chastisement.

Colonel Draper, having no offer of capitulation or surrender made him, could not prevent his troops, for some hours, from making the city feel all the rapaciousness of a common soldiery; and those he commanded, except the few regulars, could not be supposed to be of the most orderly kind. At last the citadel, being utterly untenable, the archbishop and the magistrates surrendered themselves prisoners of war, and it was immediately occupied by captain Dupont, with one hundred men of the seventy-ninth regiment. The marquis de Villa-medina, with the rest of the Spanish officers, were enlarged on giving their parole of honour; and all the Indians were dismissed in safety. This important conquest was achieved with the loss of no more than twenty men, among whom, however, was unfortunately the gallant major More, who fell by an arrow, at the royal gate.

Manilla was no sooner occupied by the British forces, than the admiral went on shore to consult with general Draper on this great event; and to settle a capitulation. This was found on trial, to be no easy matter. When the archbishop and magistrates appeared, the two English commanders generously acquainted them, they were ready to agree to a capitulation that might save so fine a city from destruction; and desired them to withdraw, to deliberate and propose such terms of compensation as might satisfy the soldiers and sailors, and secure them from pillage and its fatal consequences.

Upon their return they produced a draught of terms, in the name of the archbishop, the royal audience, and the city and commerce of Manilla, which were so little agreeable to their desperate situation, that they were rejected as unsatisfactory and inadmissible, because they made no mention of a compensation to the victors for protecting the place from military execution. The English commanders then took the pen, and prescribed the conditions on which the city of Manilla should be saved from plunder, and the inhabitants secured in their religion, liberties, and properties, under the government of his Britannic majesty. In this paper the British commanders promised that the terms proposed by the archbishop and the magistrates should be granted, if those of the ransom were complied with; to which the Spaniards agreed. In pursuance of this capitulation the town and port of Cavite, with the islands and forts depending upon Manilla, were to be delivered up to his Britannic majesty; and four millions of dollars paid as a ransom for the city of Manilla, and the effects of the inhabitants, who, on the other hand, were to be maintained in their religion and private property, under the government and protection of the king of England. The port and citadel of Cavite were surrendered, together with several large ships, and a vast quantity of warlike and naval stores. The Spanish garrison of three hundred men, instead of quietly submitting themselves agreeable to the governor's order, mutinied against their officers; and, having pillaged some houses, retired with their arms to the country. Captain Campion, with two hundred men, being embarked in the Sea-horse, took possession of the place, and captain Kempenfeldt was constituted governor of it, by a commission from the general. One third of the ransom of Manilla was allowed to the East-India company; and Mr. Draper, according to the instructions he had received, delivered up the city of Manilla, the port of Cavite, with all their artillery, ammunition, and warlike stores, to Dawson Drake, Esq; and the other persons appointed to receive them in behalf of that company. All the British forces employed in this expedition were but barely sufficient to garrison this important conquest, which was obtained with so little bloodshed, that not above one hundred men were killed in the whole service. Among these, however, was unhappily numbered the gallant commodore Tiddeman, who, in attempting to enter the river in his barge, on the morning that succeeded the reduction of the place, was unfortunately drowned with five of his people.

The

The acquisition of Luconia, with its towns, treasures, artillery, stores, islands, and dependencies, was immediately succeeded by another advantage of no small importance. Admiral Cornish having learned by means of some letters taken in the galley with the Spanish governor's nephew, that the galleon St. Philippina was arrived from Acapulco at Cajayagan, he detached in quest of her the Panther and Argo, two ships of war, commanded by the captains Parker and King; the first of the line; the other a frigate. On the thirtieth day of October, being of the island Capul, near the entrance of the Embocadero, they discovered a sail standing to the northward. The Argo being driven by the current among the Narangoes, was obliged to anchor: but captain King, in the frigate, coming up with the chase, engaged her for near two hours, during which he was roughly handled, and even compelled to desist, until his rigging could be repaired.

The current slackening, captain Parker was enabled to get under sail; and about nine next morning, came up with the enemy, who, after having been cannonaded two hours at a very small distance, struck their colours and surrendered: but the captain was not a little surprised to hear, when the Spanish general came on board, that, instead of the St. Philippina, he had taken the Santissima Trinidad, which had departed from Manilla on the first day of August, bound for Acapulco, and had sailed three hundred leagues to the eastward of the Embocadero; but, meeting with a hard gale of wind, and being dismasted, was obliged to put back and refit. She was a very large ship, so thick in the sides, that the shot of the Panther did not penetrate any part of her, except the upper works. She had eight hundred men on board; and was pierced for sixty cannon; but no more than thirteen were mounted. The merchandize on board was computed at one million and a half of dollars, and the whole cargo supposed to be worth double that sum; so that this capture was a considerable addition to the conquest, and a fresh wound to the enemy.

The news of the recovery of St. John's in Newfoundland, which arrived about this period, was likewise another cause of triumph in England.

Lord Colville was no sooner informed of the progress which the French armament had made on the coast of Newfoundland, than he sailed thither from Halifax, and blocked up the harbour of St. John's by sea, even while Mr. Ternay, the French commodore, lay at anchor in it, with a superior squadron. On the eleventh day of September, his lordship was reinforced by colonel Amherst, who had been detached on this service by his brother Sir Jeffery Amherst, commander of the forces in America. The colonel had touched at Louisbourg, and taken on board some troops, which, with those brought with him at Halifax, amounted to about eight hundred, chiefly highlanders and light infantry. They disembarked, after a slight opposition, in Torbay, about seven miles to the northward of St. John's: and this part of the country was extremely encumbered with mountains and passes occupied by the enemy. The British forces advanced to the strong post of Kitty-vitty, which they took sword in hand. They likewise dislodged the enemy from two other heights which they had fortified, and did not abandon till after an obstinate dispute. On the sixteenth of September, they took post in the neighbourhood of St. John's Fort, and, next day, a mortar battery was erected. The French commodore had sunk some shallops in the entrance of the harbour, which was commanded by a breast-work and unfinished battery. These being gained, and the channel opened, colonel Amherst received his artillery and stores, by water-carriage: but lord Colville was driven by contrary winds, to some distance from the coast. In his absence, Mr. de Ternay, availing himself of a thick fog, immediately hoisted sail and made his escape. His ships were descried at a great distance from the top-mast heads of the British squadron, steering south south-east; but not supposed to be the ships of Mr. Ternay. On the eighteenth, in the morning, Mr. de Hauffonville, the commander of the French forces at St. John's, who had been summoned, and refused to surrender, thought proper to agree to a capitulation; and delivered himself with his garrison, prisoners of war, on condition of being conveyed to Brest the first opportunity. They were a fine body of troops, very near equal in number to the besiegers; and lord Colville, who had by this time returned to the harbour, appointed some ships for transporting them to France. Thus the town and fort of St. John's, with all the other petty places which the French had taken on this coast, were recovered, with very little loss, by a handful of troops, who exerted themselves with equal courage and conduct on this occasion.

When France had found experimentally, that the present at least was not the favourable time, for drawing from her alliance all those advantages, with which she had flattered herself, she inclined in good earnest to peace. The sincerity of her procedure in the former negotiation might justly be questioned; because she had prepared an after-game in case of its proving abortive. And so much did she rely on it, that probably the negotiation itself was but a feint made to cover and to prepare that project. But finding that Great-Britain was neither intimidated by the threats of that formidable alliance, nor at all likely to be reduced by the exertion of its forces, she came, in good earnest, into those pacific sentiments, which formerly she had only counterfeited. The slow progress of the Bourbon troops in Portugal, the retrograde motion of the French army in Germany, the taking of Martinico and its dependencies, the reduction of the Havanna, all conspired to humble the pride, and dash the hopes of the Bourbon alliance.

On the side of Great-Britain, likewise, the dispositions to peace became much more cordial. No people were ever less intoxicated with successes. Victories were grown familiar to us, and made but little impression. The marks of public joy on the most considerable conquests, were become much lighter and colder, than were shewn at the beginning of the war, upon any trivial advantages. Though her trade had been greatly augmented, a circumstance beyond all example favourable; and though many of her conquests, as we have seen, were attended with the most solid advantages, her supplies of money, great as they were, did not keep pace with her expences. The supply of men too, which was necessary to answer the waste of so extensive a war, became sensibly diminished; and the the troops were not recruited but with some difficulty, and at a heavy charge. It was time to close the war, when every end, we could rationally propose to ourselves in carrying it on, was attained. We had enough to answer all our demands, and almost all our expectations; and as it is grown into a sort of maxim, that nations greatly victorious must cede something on a peace, the difficulty on our side was only what, and how much we should retain. Not that there was a doubt, but whatever choice of acquisition could be made upon any rational principles, a great deal would still remain to give the fullest scope to every sentiment of equity and moderation.

These causes co-operated to render the desires of the British ministry towards peace, altogether hearty and sincere; and they thought themselves abundantly justified in their wishes for it at this juncture, both by the successes and burthens of the nation; from the flourishing state of some of their allies, and the doubtful state of others; and, in general, from those arguments of humanity, which made it high time, that Europe should enjoy some interval of repose.

Both courts thus concurring in the same point, all difficulties were speedily smoothed. It is said that the first overtures were made under the mediation of his Sardinian majesty. As soon as terms were proposed, a resolution was taken, in order to give to each other a pledge of their mutual sincerity, that this treaty should not be negociated, as the former had been, by subordinate persons; but that the two courts should reciprocally send, to London and Versailles, a person of the first consequence and distinction in either kingdom. Accordingly, the duke of Bedford was sent to negotiate on the part of England; and the duke de Nivernois on that of France; and the great outlines of the treaty were very soon explained and adjusted. In the negociation of 1761, it had been laid down as a principle by the two courts, that their respective propositions, in case the treaty should, by any accident, be broken off, were to be considered as retracted or never made. These propositions however, notwithstanding the above salvo, still continued in force, and were assumed as the basis of the present treaty, which differed, in no essential point, from the former. The spirit of the two negociations, so far as regarded the peculiar interest of Great-Britain, seems, indeed, to have been perfectly similar. There was scarce any other difference, than that Great-Britain, in consequence of her successes, since that time acquired more than she then demanded; but still the general idea, on which she acquired, was nearly or altogether the same. But, with regard to some of our allies, the principle was greatly varied; and this change, we imagine, was sufficiently justified by the alteration which had happened in the affairs of Germany, during the interval between the two treaties. Those who conducted the negociation in 1761, were steady in rejecting every proposition, in which they were not left at liberty to aid the king of Prussia with the whole force of Great-Britain: those who concluded the peace in 1762, paid less attention to the interests, though they did not wholly neglect the safety, of that monarch. At the beginning of the year, and before they had entered into this negociation, they refused, as I have observed, to renew that article of the annual treaty, by which our court had engaged to conclude no peace without the consent of his Prussian majesty; though, at the same time, they declared themselves willing to assist him with the annual subsidy. He, on his part, refused the subsidy, unconnected with that article. Some coldness grew between the two courts from this time forward.

The preliminaries of the peace, which were now pretty well known, were subjected to a severe scrutiny; and many plausible arguments were advanced on both sides of the question. It was urged, on the one hand, that, in this treaty, we had lost sight of that great fundamental article, that France is chiefly, if not solely, to be dreaded in the light of a maritime and commercial power: that, therefore, we had, by restoring to her all her valuable West-Indian islands, and by our concessions in the Newfoundland fishery, left in her hands the means of recovering her prodigious losses, and of becoming once more formidable to us at sea: that the fishery trained up an innumerable multitude of young seamen; and that the West-Indian trade employed them when they were trained: that France had, long since, gained a decided superiority over us in this lucrative branch of commerce, and supplied almost all Europe with the rich commodities which are produced only in this part of the world: that, by this commerce, she enriched her merchants, and augmented her finances; whilst, from a want of sugar land, which had been long known, and severely felt, by England, we at once lost the foreign trade, and suffered all the inconveniencies of a monopoly at home: that, at the close of so expensive a war, we might very reasonably demand something towards our indemnification, as well as towards our security: that it was evident, that our conquests in North-America, however they might provide for the one, were altogether inadequate to the other of these ends: that the state of the present trade of these conquests was extremely low; the hopes of their future commerce were precarious; and the prospect, at best, very remote: that we stood in need of supplies which would have an effect, certain, speedy, and considerable: that the retaining both or even one of the considerable French islands, Martinico or Guadaloupe, would, and nothing else could, effectually answer this triple purpose: that the advantage was immediate; it was a matter, not of conjecture, but of account: that the trade with these conquests, was of the most lucrative nature, and of the most considerable extent; the number of ships employed in it were a great addition to our maritime power; the monopoly at home was corrected, and the foreign trade recovered; and, what was of equal weight, all that we gained on this system, was made fourfold to us, by the loss which ensued to France; but our conquests in North-America, however advantageous they might prove to us, with regard to the security of our settlements (for in that respect alone, they were of any moment) were of little detriment to the commerce of France; on the West-Indian scheme of acquisition, our gain and her loss were in exact proportion: that the connection of this trade with that of our colonies in North-America, and with our commerce to the coast of Africa, was obvious at first sight: that the African trade would be augmented by the demand for slaves; that of North-America would all center in ourselves; whereas, if the islands were all restored, a great part of the benefit of the northern colony trade must redound, as it had hitherto done, to those who had been lately our enemies, and would always be our rivals: that there was nothing extravagant or overbearing in this demand: that, though we should retain either Martinico or Guadaloupe, or even both these islands, our conquests were such, that there would still be abundant matter left to display our moderation in the cession of the rest; to say nothing of our many concessions in the fishery, on the coast of Africa, and in the East-Indies, of all which great branches of commerce the French had been intirely dispossessed in this war, and to a considerable share of which they would be restored by the treaty: that if further concessions be made (for which, however, there appeared no necessity) the demand in North-America might be somewhat contracted: that, by this method, we should lose nothing to our commerce; nor should we, in the least, hazard our security; as we should still be infinitely superior in strength; and whenever a war broke out, that power would be most secure, whose resources were most considerable.

It was alledged, on the other hand, that the original object of the war was the security of our colonies on the continent; that the danger to which these colonies were exposed, and, in consequence of that danger, the immense waste of blood and treasure which ensued to Great-Britain, together with the calamities, which were, from the same source, derived upon the four quarters of the world, left no sort of doubt, that it was not only our best, but our only policy, to guard against all possibility of the return of such evils: that experience had shewn us, that while France possessed any single place in America, from whence she might molest our settlements, they could never enjoy any repose, and, of course, that we were never secure from being plunged again into those calamities, from which we had, at length, and with so much difficulty, happily emerged: that to remove France from our neighbourhood in America, or to contract her power within the narrowest limits possible, was therefore the most capital advantage we could obtain, and was worth purchasing almost by any concessions: that the absolute security derived from this plan, included in itself an indemnification; first, by saving us, more effectually than any other method could, from the necessity of another war, and consequently by giving us an opportunity of increasing our trade, and lowering our debt, secondly, by permitting our colonies on the continent to extend themselves, without danger or molestation: that the great increase of population in those colonies, within a few years, was notorious; and that their trade with the mother country had uniformly increased with this population: that being now freed from the molestation of enemies, and the emulation of rivals, unlimited in their possessions, and safe in their persons, our American planters would, by the very course of their natural propagation, in a very short time, furnish out a demand of our manufactures, as large as all the working hands of Great-Britain could possibly supply: that there was therefore no reason to dread that want of trade which was supposed to be approaching; since North-America alone would supply the deficiencies of our trade in every other part of the world: that the great variety of climates, which that country contained, was a circumstance of the most promising nature, and would be productive of the most beneficial effects on trade and commerce: that the value of our conquests, therefore, ought not to be estimated by their present produce, but by their probable increase; nor, indeed, ought the value of any country to be solely determined by its commercial advantages: that extent of territory, and a number of subjects, are matters of as much consideration to a state attentive to the sources of real grandeur, as the mere advantages of traffic; the latter ideas being rather suitable to a limited and petty commonwealth, like Holland, than to a great, powerful, and warlike nation: that, on these principles, having made very large demands in North-America, it was necessary to relax in other parts: that France could never be brought to any considerable cession in the West-Indies; but that her power and increase there could never become formidable, inasmuch as the existence of her settlements depended upon ours in North-America, she not being any longer left a place, from whence they can be supplied with provisions: that, in losing something of the sugar-trade, we lost very little else than a luxury; and that as to the other produce of the West-Indies, it might be, in a great measure, and in part was already supplied by our possessions on the continent, which daily increased not only in the quantity but in the kind of its produce.—I shall not pretend to pass any judgment on the merits of the several sides of this question, which is certainly a very difficult one. I only relate opinions, as well as facts, historically.

While this treaty remained upon the carper, it formed a great crisis, as well in the fortune of the new ministry, as in the affairs of the nation. Towards the latter end of the summer, Mr. F— was called in, and engaged in their support. Though he continued in his old place of pay-master, he undertook to conduct the affairs of government in the house of commons. Mr. Gr—, whose office would naturally have engaged him in that task, resigned the seals of secretary of state, and was appointed first lord of the admiralty. The great experience and known parliamentary abilities of Mr. F— seemed to give new life to the affairs of the administration. A more vigorous and determined conduct was from that time adopted. Many of those, who were not perfectly attached to the new system, were immediately removed from their places; and measures were taken to clear every department of every friend of the D. of N—.

On the twenty-fifth day of November, the parliament being assembled, his majesty harangued them from the throne. He observed, that the late war with Spain, and the attack of his ally, the king of Portugal, having greatly affected the commerce of his subjects, multiplied the objects of his military operations, and added to the heavy burthens of his people; he had willingly embraced an occasion that offered of renewing the negotiation for peace. He gave them to understand, that the preliminary articles were actually signed: that, by the conditions in which all parties had acquiesced, an immense territory was added to the empire of Great-Britain; and a solid foundation laid for the increase of commerce; that care had been taken to remove all occasions of future disputes; that the king of Portugal was secured in all his dominions; and that all the territories of his German allies were evacuated by the troops of France. He lamented that a great number of his subjects had been lost in different parts of the world; a consideration which reinforced the other reasons he had to engage in the negotiation; and that he had hastened the conclusion of it, to prevent the necessity of making preparations for another campaign. He desired the commons to consider of such methods in the settlement of the new acquisitions, as should most effectually tend to the security of those countries, and to the improvement of the British trade and navigation. He recommended to their care and attention, his gallant subjects by whose valour those acquisitions were made. He observed, that union at home was peculiarly necessary to lay the foundation of that œconomy which they owed to themselves and their posterity, and which alone could relieve the nation from the heavy burthens entailed upon it by the necessities of a long expensive war.

In answer to this speech, addressees were presented as usual by both houses containing general compliments of congratulation on the approach of peace, as well as upon the birth of the prince of Wales*; next day a cessation of arms was proclaimed; and orders were given for opening again all the channels of communication with France and Spain. When the upper house took the articles of the peace into consideration, many objections were made by the lords in the opposition; and some severe reflections were thrown out against the earl of B—te, with appearance of heat and personal animosity. That nobleman defended his own conduct with temper and decorum, in a well connected speech delivered with great propriety, to the surprise of many, who did not think him so well qualified in the art and faculty of elocution. He gave a detail of the negotiation; and not only owned himself a warm promoter of the peace, but even expressed a desire that this circumstance should be engraved upon his tomb. He was seconded by the earl of Halifax, and supported by a great majority.

The same good fortune attended the administration in the other house, where the opposition made its appearance in a number that was by no means formidable. Mr. P—tt, though in his health greatly indisposed, resolved to disapprove the peace in person. He came into the house, supported on the arms of his friends, and obtained of the speaker permission to harangue sitting. In this attitude he spoke above two hours without intermission. The scope of his speech was to justify his own conduct in the administration; and to give his opinion of the separate articles of the peace, which upon the whole, he condemned as inadequate to the success of the British arms. The mayor of London spoke on the same side, without making much impression; and both houses agreed upon addressees of approbation; which were presented accordingly. The definitive treaty of peace, signed at Paris on the tenth day of February, was couched in these terms:

The Definitive Treaty of Peace and Friendship, between his Britannick Majesty, the Most Christian King, and the King of Spain. Concluded at Paris, the 10th Day of February, 1763. To which the King of Portugal acceded on the same Day.

In the Name of the most Holy and Undivided Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. So be it.

BE it known to all those to whom it shall, or may, in any manner, belong.

“It has pleased the Most High to diffuse the spirit of union and concord among the princes, whose divisions had spread troubles in the four parts of the world, and to inspire them with the inclination to cause the comforts of peace to succeed to the misfortunes of a long and bloody war, which having arisen between England and France, during the reign of the most serene and most potent prince, George the Second, by the Grace of God, king of Great-Britain, of glorious memory, continued under the reign of the most serene and most potent prince, George the Third, successor, and, in its progress, communicated itself to Spain and Portugal: consequently, the most serene and most potent prince, George the Third, by the Grace of God, King of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, Duke of Brunswick and Lunenbourg, Arch-Treasurer, and Elector, of the Holy Roman Empire; the most serene and most potent prince, Lewis the Fifteenth, by the Grace of God, the most Christian King; and the most serene and most potent prince, Charles the Third, by the Grace of God, King of Spain and of the Indies, after having laid the foundations of peace in the preliminaries, signed at Fountainbleau the third of November last; and the most serene and most potent prince, Don Joseph the First, by the Grace of God, King of Portugal and of the Algarves, after having acceded thereto, determined to complete without delay, this great and important work. For this purpose the high contracting parties have named and appointed their respective ambassadors extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, viz. his Sacred Majesty the King of Great-Britain, the most illustrious and most excellent lord John Duke and Earl of Bedford, marquis of Tavistock, &c. his minister of State, Lieutenant General of his Armies, Keeper of his Privy Seal, Knight of the most Noble Order of the Garter, and his Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to his Most Christian Majesty: his Sacred Majesty the Most Christian King, the most illustrious and most excellent lord Cæsar Gabriel de Choiseul, Duke of Praslin, peer of France, Knight of his Orders, Lieutenant General of his Armies, and of the province of Brittany, Counsellor of all his Councils, and Minister and Secretary of State, and of his Commands and Finances: his Sacred

Majesty the Catholick King, the most illustrious and most excellent lord, Don Jerome Grimaldi, Marquis de Grimaldi, Knight of the most Christian King's Orders, Gentleman of his Catholick Majesty's Bed-chamber in employment, and his Ambassador Extraordinary to his most Christian Majesty: his Sacred Majesty the Most Faithful King, the most illustrious and most excellent lord, Martin de Mello and Castro, Knight professed of the Order of Christ, of his Most Faithful Majesty's Council, and his Ambassador and Minister Plenipotentiary to his most Christian Majesty.

"Who, after having duly communicated to each other their full powers, in good form, have agreed upon the articles, the tenor of which is as follows:

"Art. I. There shall be a christian, universal and perpetual peace, as well by sea as by land, and a sincere and constant friendship shall be re-established between their Britannick, Most Christian, Catholick, and Most Faithful Majesties, and between their heirs and successors, kingdoms, dominions, provinces, countries, vassals, and subjects, of what quality or condition soever they be, without exceptions of places, or of persons: so that the high contracting parties shall give the greatest attention to maintain between themselves and their said dominions and subjects, this reciprocal friendship and correspondence, without permitting, on either side, any kind of hostilities, by sea or by land, to be committed from henceforth, for any cause, or under any pretence, whatsoever; and every thing shall be carefully avoided, which might hereafter prejudice the union happily re-established, applying themselves, on the contrary, on every occasion, to procure for each other whatever may contribute to their mutual glory, interests, and advantages, without giving any assistance or protection, directly or indirectly, to those who would cause any prejudice to either of the high contracting parties: there shall be a general oblivion of every thing that may have been done or committed before, or since, the commencement of the war which is just ended.

"Art. II. The treaties of Westphalia of 1648; those of Madrid between the two crowns of Great-Britain and Spain of 1667, and 1670; the treaties of peace of Nimeguen of 1678, and 1679; of Ryswyck of 1697; those of peace and of commerce of Utrecht of 1713; that of Baden of 1714; that of the triple alliance of the Hague of 1717; that of the quadruple alliance of London of 1718; the treaty of peace of Vienna of 1738; the definitive treaty of Aix la Chapelle of 1748; and that of Madrid, between the crown of Great-Britain and Spain, of 1750; as well as the treaties between the crowns of Spain and Portugal, of the 13th of February 1668; of the 6th of February 1715; and of the 12th of February 1716; and that of the 11th of April 1713; between France and Portugal with the guarantees of Great-Britain; serve as a basis and foundation to the peace, and the present treaty: and for this purpose, they are all renewed and confirmed in the best form, as well as all the treaties in general, which subsisted between the high contracting parties before the war, as if they were inserted here word for word; so that they are to be exactly observed, for the future, in their whole tenor, and religiously executed on all sides, in all their points, which shall not be derogated from by the present treaty; notwithstanding all that may have been stipulated to the contrary by any of the high contracting parties: and all the said parties declare, that they will not suffer any privilege, favour, or indulgence, to subsist, contrary to the treaties above confirmed, except what shall have been agreed and stipulated by the present treaty.

"Art. III. All the prisoners made on all sides, as well by land as by sea, and the hostages carried away, or given during the war, and to this day, shall be restored, without ransom, six weeks at latest, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, each crown respectively paying the advances which shall have been made for the subsistence and maintenance of their prisoners, by the sovereign of the country where they shall have been detained, according to the attested receipts and estimates, and other authentic vouchers, which shall be furnished on one side and the other: and securities shall be reciprocally given for the payment of the debts which the prisoners shall have contracted in the countries where they have been detained, until their entire liberty. And all the ships of war and merchant-vessels, which shall have been taken since the expiration of the terms agreed upon for the cessation of hostilities by sea, shall be likewise restored bona fide, with all their crews and cargoes: and the execution of this article shall be proceeded upon immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty.

"Art. IV. His most Christian Majesty renounces all pretensions which he has heretofore formed, or might form, to Nova Scotia, or Acadia in all its parts; and guarantees the whole of it, and with it all its dependencies, to the King of Great-Britain: moreover, his Most Christian Majesty cedes and guaranties to his said Britannick Majesty, in full right, Canada, with all its dependencies, as well as the island of Cape Breton, and all the other islands and coasts in the gulph and river St. Laurence, and, in general, every thing that depends on the said countries, lands, islands, and coasts, with the sovereignty, property, possession, and all rights acquired by treaty or otherwise, which the Most Christian King, and the crown of France, have had, till now, over the said countries, islands, lands, places, coasts, and their inhabitants, so that the Most Christian King cedes and makes over the whole to the said King, and to the crown of Great-Britain, and that in the most ample manner and form, without restriction, and without any liberty to depart from the said cession and guaranty, under any pretence, or to disturb Great-Britain in the possessions above-mentioned. His Britannick Majesty, on his side, agrees to grant the liberty of the Catholick religion to the inhabitants of Canada: he will, consequently, give the most precise and most effectual orders, that his new Roman Catholick subjects may profess the worship of their religion, according to the rites of the Romish church, as far as the laws of Great-Britain permit. His Britannick Majesty further agrees, that the French inhabitants, or others who had been subjects of the Most Christian King in Canada, may retire, with all safety and freedom, wherever they shall think proper, and may sell their estates, provided vided it be to the subjects of his Britannick Majesty, and bring away their effects, as well as their persons, without being restrained in their emigration, under any pretence whatsoever, except that of debts, or of criminal prosecutions: the term limited for this emigration shall be fixed to the space of eighteen months, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratification of the present treaty.

“ V. The subjects of France shall have the liberty of fishing and drying on a part of the coasts of the island of Newfoundland, such as it is specified in the XIIIth article of the treaty of Utrecht; which article is renewed and confirmed by the present treaty (except what relates to the island of Cape Breton, as well as to the other islands and coasts in the mouth and in the gulph of St. Laurence): and his Britannick Majesty consents to leave to the subjects of the most Christian King the liberty of fishing in the gulph St. Laurence, on condition that the subjects of France do not exercise the said fishery, but at the distance of three leagues from all the coasts belonging to Great-Britain, as well those of the continent, as those of the islands situated in the said gulph St. Laurence. And as to what relates to the fishery on the coasts of the island of Cape Breton out of the said gulph, the subjects of the most Christian King shall not be permitted to exercise the said fishery, but at the distance of fifteen leagues from the coasts of the island of Cape Breton; and the fishery on the coasts of Nova Scotia or Acadia, and every where else out of the said gulph, shall remain on the foot of former treaties.

“ Art. VI. The King of Great-Britain cedes the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, in full right, to his Most Christian Majesty, to serve as shelter to the French fishermen: and his said Most Christian Majesty engages not to fortify the said islands; to erect no buildings upon them, but merely for the convenience of the fishery; and to keep upon them a guard of fifty men only for the police.

“ Art. VII. In order to re-establish peace on solid and durable foundations, and to remove for ever all subject of dispute with regard to the limits of the British and French territories on the continent of America; it is agreed, that, for the future, the confines between the dominions of his Britannick Majesty and those of his Most Christian Majesty, in that part of the world, shall be fixed irrevocably by a line drawn along the middle of the river Mississippi, from its source to the river Iberville, and from thence, by a line drawn along the middle of this river, and the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, to the sea; and for this purpose, the Most Christian King cedes in full right, and guaranties to his Britannick Majesty, the river and port of the Mobile, and every thing which he possesses, or ought to possess, on the left side of the river Mississippi, except the town of New Orleans, and the island in which it is situated, which shall remain to France; provided that the navigation of the river Mississippi shall be equally free, as well to the subjects of Great-Britain, as to those of France, in its whole breadth and length, from its source to the sea, and expressly that part which is between the said island of New Orleans, and the right bank of that river, as well as the passage both in and out of its mouth. It is farther stipulated, that the vessels belonging to the subjects of either nation, shall not be stopped, visited, or subjected to the payment of any duty whatsoever. The stipulations inserted in the IVth article, in favour of the inhabitants of Canada, shall also take place with regard to the inhabitants of the countries ceded by this article.

“ Art. VIII. The King of Great-Britain shall restore to France the islands of Guadaloupe, of Marie Galante, of Desirade, of Martinico, and of Belleisle; and the fortresses of these islands shall be restored in the same condition they were in, when they were conquered by the British arms; provided that his Britannick Majesty's subjects who shall have settled in the said islands, or those who shall have any commercial affairs to settle there, or in the other places restored to France by the present treaty, shall have liberty to sell their lands and their estates, to settle their affairs, to recover their debts, and bring away their effects, as well as their persons, on board vessels, which they shall be permitted to send to the said islands, and other places restored as above, and which shall serve for this use only, without being restrained on account of their religion, or under any other pretence whatsoever, except that of debts, or of criminal prosecutions: and for this purpose the term of eighteen months is allowed to his Britannick Majesty's subjects, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty: but as the liberty granted to his Britannick Majesty's subjects, to bring away their persons and their effects, in vessels of their nation, may be liable to abuses, if precautions were not taken to prevent them; it has been expressly agreed between his Britannick Majesty and his Most Christian Majesty, that the number of English vessels, which shall have leave to go to the said islands and places restored to France, shall be limited, as well as the number of tons of each one; that they shall go in ballast; shall set sail at a fixed time; and shall make one voyage only, all the effects belonging to the English being to be embarked at the same time. It has been further agreed, that his Most Christian Majesty shall cause the necessary passports to be given to the said vessels; that, for the greater security, it shall be allowed to place two French clerks, or guards, in each of the said vessels, which shall be visited in the landing places and ports of the said islands and places restored to France, and that the merchandize which shall be found therein shall be confiscated.

“ Art. IX. The Most Christian King cedes and guaranties to his Britannick Majesty, in full right, the islands of Grenada, and of the Grenadines, with the same stipulations in favour of the inhabitants of this colony, inserted in the IVth article for those of Canada: and the partition of the islands called Neutral, is agreed and fixed, so that those of St. Vincent, Dominica, and Tobago, shall remain in full right to Great-Britain, and that of St. Lucia shall be delivered to France, to enjoy the same likewise in full right; and the high contracting parties guaranty the partition so stipulated.

“ Art. X. His Britannick Majesty shall restore to France the island of Goree in the condition it was in when conquered: and his Most Christian Majesty cedes in full right, and guaranties to the King of Great-Britain, the river Senegal, with the forts and factories of St. Lewis, Podor, and Galam;

and with all the rights and dependencies of the said river Senegal.

“ Art. XI. In the East-Indies, Great-Britain shall restore to France, in the condition they are now in, the different factories which that crown possessed, as well on the coast of Coromandel and Orixa, as on that of Malabar, as also in Bengal, at the beginning of the year 1749. And his Most Christian Majesty renounces all pretensions to the acquisition which he had made on the coast of Coromandel and Orixa, since the said beginning of the year 1749. His Most Christian Majesty shall restore on his side, all that he may have conquered from Great-Britain, in the East-Indies, during the present war; and will expressly cause Nattal and Tapanouly in the island of Sumatra, to be restored; he engages further not to erect fortifications, or to keep troops, in any part of the dominions of the Subah of Bengal. And in order to preserve future peace on the coast of Coromandel and Orixa, the English and French shall acknowledge Mahomet Ally Khan for lawful Nabob of the Carnatick, and Salabat Jing for lawful Subah of the Decan; and both parties shall renounce all demands and pretensions of satisfaction, with which they might charge each other, or their Indian allies, for their depredations, or pillage, committed, on the one side or on the other, during the war.

“ Art. XII. The island of Minorca shall be restored to his Britannick Majesty, as well as Fort St. Philip, in the same condition they were in, when conquered by the arms of the Most Christian King; and with the artillery which was there, when the said island and the said fort were taken.

“ Art. XIII. The town and port of Dunkirk shall be put into the state fixed by the last treaty of Aix la Chapelle, and by former treaties. The cunette shall be destroyed immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, as well as the forts and batteries which defend the entrance on the side of the sea; and provision shall be made, at the same time, for the wholesomeness of the air, and for the health of the inhabitants, by some other means, to the satisfaction of the King of Great-Britain.

“ Art. XIV. France shall restore all the countries belonging to the electorate of Hanover, to the Landgrave of Hesse, to the Duke of Brunswick, and to the Count of La Lippe Buckebourg, which are or shall be occupied by his Most Christian Majesty's arms: the fortresses of these different countries shall be restored in the same condition they were in when conquered by the French arms; and the pieces of artillery, which shall have been carried elsewhere, shall be replaced by the same number, of the same bore, weight, and metal.

“ Art. XV. In case the stipulations contained in the XIIIth article of the preliminaries, should not be completed at the time of the signature of the present treaty, as well with regard to the evacuations to be made by the armies of France of the fortresses of Cleves, Wesel, Guelders, and of all the countries belonging to the King of Prussia, as with regard to the evacuations to be made by the British and French armies of the countries which they occupy in Westphalia, Lower Saxony, on the Lower Rhine, Upper Rhine, and in all the empire, and to the retreat of the troops into the dominions of their respective sovereigns: their Britannick and Most Christian Majesties promise to proceed, bona fide, with all the dispatch the case will permit of, to the said evacuations, the entire completion whereof they stipulate before the 15th of March next, or sooner if it can be done: and their Britannick and Most Christian Majesties further engage and promise to each other, not to furnish any succours, of any kind, to their respective allies who shall continue engaged in the war in Germany.

“ Art. XVI. The decision of the prizes made in time of peace, by the subjects of Great Britain, on the Spaniards, shall be referred to the courts of justice of the admiralty of Great-Britain, conformably to the rules established among all nations, so that the validity of the said prizes, between the British and Spanish nations, shall be decided and judged, according to the law of nations, and according to treaties in the courts of justice of the nation who shall have made the capture.

“ Art. XVII. His Britannick Majesty shall cause to be demolished all the fortifications which his subjects shall have erected in the Bay of Honduras, and other places of the territory of Spain in that part of the world, four months after the ratification of the present treaty: and his Catholick Majesty shall not permit his Britannick Majesty's subjects, or their workmen, to be disturbed, or molested, under any pretence whatsoever, in the said places, in their occupation of cutting, loading, and carrying away, logwood: and for this purpose they may build without hindrance, and occupy without interruption, the houses and magazines which are necessary for them, for their families, and for their effects: and his Catholick Majesty assures to them, by this article, the full enjoyment of those advantages, and powers, on the Spanish coasts and territories, as above stipulated, immediately after the ratification of the present treaty.

“ Art. XVIII. His Catholick Majesty desists, as well for himself as for his successors, from all pretensions which he may have formed in favour of the Guipuscoans, and other his subjects, to the right of fishing in the neighbourhood of the island of Newfoundland.

“ Art. XIX. The King of Great-Britain shall restore to Spain all the territory which he has conquered in the island of Cuba, with the fortress of the Havanna; and this fortress, as well as all the other fortresses of the said island, shall be restored in the same condition they were in when conquered by his Britannick Majesty's arms; provided that his Britannick Majesty's subjects who shall have settled in the said island, restored to Spain by the present treaty, or those who shall have any commercial affairs to settle there, shall have liberty to sell their lands and their estates, to settle their affairs, to recover their debts, and to bring away their effects as well as their persons, on board vessels which they shall be permitted to send to the said island restored as above, and which shall serve for that use only, without being restrained on account of their religion, or under any pretence whatsoever, except that of debts, or of criminal prosecution: and for this purpose the term of eighteen months is allowed to his Britannick Majesty's subjects, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty: but as the liberty granted to his Britannick Majesty's subjects, to bring away their persons persons and their effects, in vessels of their nation, may be liable to abuses, if precautions are not taken to prevent them; it has been expressly agreed between his Britannick Majesty and his Catholick Majesty, that the number of English vessels, which shall have leave to go to the said island restored to Spain, shall be limited, as well as the number of tons of each one; that they shall go in ballast; shall set sail at a fixed time; and shall make one voyage only; all the effects belonging to the English being to be embarked at the same time: It has been further agreed, that his Catholick Majesty shall cause the necessary passports to be given to the said vessels; that, for the greater security, it shall be allowed to place two Spanish clerks, or guards, in each of the said vessels, which shall be visited in the landing-places, and ports of the said island restored to Spain, and that the merchandize, which shall be found therein, shall be confiscated.

“ Art. XX. In consequence of the restitution stipulated in the preceding article, his Catholick Majesty cedes and guaranties, in full right, to his Britannick Majesty, Florida, with Fort St. Augustin, and the bay of Pensacola, as well as all that Spain possesses on the continent of North-America, to the east or to the south-east of the river Mississippi, and, in general, every thing that depends on the said countries and lands, with the sovereignty, property, possession, and all rights, acquired by treaties, or otherwise, which the Catholick King, and the crown of Spain have had, till now, over the said countries, lands, places, and other inhabitants; so that the Catholick King cedes and makes over the whole to the said King, and to the crown of Great-Britain, and that in the most ample manner and form. His Britannick Majesty agrees, on his side, to grant to the inhabitants of the countries above ceded, the liberty of the Catholic religion: he will consequently give the most express and the most effectual orders that his new Roman Catholick subjects may profess the worship of their religion, according to the rites of the Romish church, as far as the laws of Great-Britain permit: his Britannick Majesty farther agrees, that the Spanish inhabitants, or others who had been subjects of the Catholick King in the said countries, may retire, with all safety and freedom, wherever they think proper; and may sell their estates, provided it be to his Britannick Majesty's subjects, and bring away their effects, as well as their persons without being restrained in their emigration, under any pretence whatsoever, except that of debts or of criminal prosecutions; the term limited for this emigration being fixed to the space of eighteen months, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty. It is moreover stipulated, that his Catholick Majesty shall have power to cause all the effects that may belong to him to be brought away, whether it be artillery, or other things.

“ Art. XXI. The French and Spanish troops shall evacuate all the territories, lands, towns, places, and castles, of his most Faithful Majesty in Europe, without any reserve, which shall have been conquered by the armies of France and Spain, and shall restore them in the same condition they were in when conquered, with the same artillery, and ammunition, which were found there: and with regard to the Portuguese colonies in America, Africa, or in the East-Indies, if any change shall have happened there, all things shall be restored on the same footing they were in, and conformably to the preceding treaties, which subsisted between the courts of France, Spain, and Portugal, before the present war.

“ Art. XXII. All the papers, letters, documents, and archives, which were found in the countries, territories, towns, and places, that are restored, and those belonging to the countries ceded, shall be respectively and bona fide, delivered, or furnished at the same time, if possible, that possession is taken, or, at latest, four months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, in whatever places the said papers or documents may be found.

“ Art. XXIII. All the countries and territories, which may have been conquered, in whatsoever part of the world, by the arms of their Britannick and Most Faithful Majesties, as well as by those of their Most Christian and Catholick Majesties, which are not included in the present treaty, either under the title of cessions, or under the title of restitutions, shall be restored without difficulty, and without requiring any compensation.

“ Art. XXIV. As it is necessary to assign a fixed epoch for the restitutions, and the evacuations, to be made by each of the high contracting parties; it is agreed, that the British and French troops shall complete, before the 15th of March next, all that shall remain to be executed of the XIIth and XIIIth articles of the preliminaries, signed the 3d day of November last, with regard to the evacuation to be made in the empire, or elsewhere. The island of Belleisle shall be evacuated six weeks after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, or sooner, if it can be done. Guadaloupe, Desirade, Marie Galante, Martinico, and St. Lucia, three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, or sooner, if it can be done. Great-Britain shall likewise, at the end of three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, or sooner if it can be done, enter into possession of the river and port of the Mobile, and of all that is to form the limits of the territory of Great-Britain, on the side of the river Mississippi, as they are specified in the VIIth article. The island of Goree shall be evacuated by Great-Britain, three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty; and the island of Minorca, by France, at the same epoch, or sooner if it can be done: and according to the conditions of the VIth article, France shall likewise enter into possession of the islands of St. Peter and of Miquelon, at the end of three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty. The factories in the East-Indies shall be restored six months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, or sooner, if it can be done. The fortrefs of the Havanna, with all that has been conquered in the island of Cuba, shall be restored three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, or sooner, if it can be done: and, at the same time, Great-Britain shall enter into possession of the country ceded by Spain, according to the XXth article. All the places and countries of his Most Faithful Majesty in Europe, shall be restored imme-immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty; and the Portuguese colonies, which may have been conquered, shall be restored in the space of three months in the West-Indies, and of six months in the East-Indies, after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, or sooner if it can be done. All the fortresses, the restitution whereof is stipulated above, shall be restored with the artillery and ammunition which were found there at the time of the conquest. In consequence whereof, the necessary orders shall be sent by each of the high contracting parties, with reciprocal passports for the ships that shall carry them, immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty.

“ Art. XXV. His Britannick Majesty, as Elector of Brunswick Lunenbourg, as well for himself, as for his heirs and successors, and all the dominions and possessions of his said Majesty in Germany, are included and guaranteed by the present treaty of peace.

“ Art. XXVI. Their Sacred Britannick, Most Christian, Catholick, and Most Faithful Majesties, promise to observe, sincerely and bona fide, all the articles contained and settled in the present treaty; and they will not suffer the same to be infringed, directly or indirectly, by their respective subjects; and the said high contracting parties, generally and reciprocally, guaranty to each other all the stipulations of the present treaty.

“ Art. XXVII. The solemn ratifications of the present treaty, expedited in good and due form, shall be exchanged in this city of Paris between the high contracting parties, in the space of a month, or sooner if possible, to be computed from the day of the signature of the present treaty.

“ In witness whereof, we the underwritten, their Ambassadors Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary, have signed with our hand, in their name, and in virtue of our full powers, the present Definitive Treaty, and have caused the seal of our arms to be put thereto.”

SEPARATE ARTICLES.

I. SOME of the titles made use of by the contracting powers, either in their full powers and other acts, during the course of the negotiation, or in the preamble of the present treaty, not being generally acknowledged; it has been agreed, That no prejudice shall ever result therefrom to any of the said contracting parties, and that the titles taken or omitted on either side, on occasion of the said negotiation and of the present treaty, shall not be cited or quoted as a precedent.

II. It has been agreed and determined, That the French language, made use of in all the copies of the present treaty, shall not become an example, which may be alledged, or made a precedent of, or prejudice, in any manner, any of the contracting powers; and that they shall conform themselves, for the future, to what has been observed, and ought to be observed, with regard to, and on the part of, powers who are used, and have a right, to give and to receive copies of like treaties in another language than French; the present treaty having still the same force and effect, as if the afore-said custom had been therein observed.

III. Though the King of Portugal has not signed the present definitive treaty, their Britannick, Most Christian, and Catholick Majesties, acknowledge, nevertheless, that his Most Faithful Majesty is formally included therein as a contracting party, and as if he had expressly signed the said treaty; consequently, their Britannick, Most Christian, and Catholick Majesties, respectively and conjointly, promise to his Most Faithful Majesty, in the most express and most binding manner, the execution of all and every the clauses contained in the said treaty, on his act of accession.

The present separate articles shall have the same force as if they were inserted in the treaty.

Declaration of his Most Christian Majesty's Plenipotentiary, with regard to the debts due to the Canadians.

THE King of Great-Britain having desired, that the payment of the letters of exchange and bills which have been delivered to the Canadians for the necessaries furnished to the French troops, should be secured, his Most Christian Majesty, entirely disposed to render to every one that justice which is legally due to them, has declared, and does declare, that the said bills and letters of exchange shall be punctually paid, agreeably to a liquidation made in a convenient time, according to the distance of the places, and to what shall be possible; taking care, however, that the bills and letters of exchange, which the French subjects may have at the time of this declaration, be not confounded with the bills and letters of exchange which are in the possession of the new subjects of the King of Great-Britain.

In witness whereof, we the underwritten minister of his Most Christian Majesty, duly authorized for this purpose, have signed the present declaration, and caused the seal of our arms to be put thereto.

Declaration of his Britannick Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, with regard to the limits of Bengal in the East-Indies.

WE the underwritten Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the King of Great-Britain, in order to prevent all subject of dispute on account of the limits of the dominions of the Subah of Bengal, as well as of the coast of Coromandel, and Orixá, declare, in the name, and by order of his said Britannick Majesty, that the said dominions of the Subah of Bengal shall be reputed not to extend farther than Yanaon exclusively, and that Yanaon shall be considered as included in the north part of the coast of Coromandel or Orixá.

The

The reader will, at one glance, perceive that these terms are more advantageous to Great-Britain and her allies, than those which were agreed to by the late minister. He must determine for himself, whether they were such as she ought to have insisted upon, in consequence of her additional successes. Certainly they were more favourable for France and Spain, than those powers could have reasonably expected to enjoy, after the losses they had sustained. It must be acknowledged that Great-Britain, by extending the frontiers of Canada to the middle of the Mississippi, gained a large tract of fertile country lying on the banks of that river, besides the advantage of a free navigation upon it, and the possession of the port of Mobile: but, in order to secure the English American colonies from all possibility of disturbance from the French, that restless nation ought to have been expelled from New Orleans, and the whole country of Louisiana; for, while they remain in this settlement, at liberty to penetrate by the river to the remote tribes of Indians, they will still maintain their influence among those savages: they will supply them with necessaries, consequently weaken their dependence upon the English; and employ their arts of insinuation upon them so effectually, as to have it always in their power to hunt them upon the defenceless back-settlements of the British colonists. It does not appear that the British ministry were well acquainted with the importance of this article.

England, by this peace, likewise gained an accession, in France's ceding to her the island of Grenada, which, when fully cultivated and peopled, may be of some consequence. She moreover acquired the unsettled islands of Dominica, Tobago, and St. Vincent; but yielded to France the island of St. Lucie, said to be worth all the rest. She retains the settlement of Senegal on the coast of Africa, by which she engrosses the whole gum trade of that country; as for the rock of Goree, which she restored, it was no great sacrifice. The article that relates to the East-Indies, was dictated by the directors of the English company; and surely the French have no reason to complain of its severity, as it restores them to the possession of all the places they had at the beginning of the war, on condition that they shall maintain neither forts nor forces in the kingdom of Bengal; thus they will enjoy all their former advantages in trade, without the temptation and expence of forming schemes of conquest and dominion.

As the treaty makes no mention of the ships taken from the subjects of France before the declaration of war, in all probability, the king of Great-Britain agreed that their owners should be indemnified; a concession which barely atones for a measure which (whatever may have been alledged in its justification) will always be considered by the candid and impartial, as an act of violence and rapine, that strikes at the very root of the law of nations, which, for the interests of humanity in general, ought to be held sacred, even amidst the warmest transports of animosity and resentment.

The liberty of cutting logwood in the bay of Honduras, granted to the subjects of Great-Britain, was undoubtedly a great point gained in their favour; but their obliging themselves to demolish their fortifications on that coast, was a tacit acknowledgement that the privilege was not founded upon right, but derived from favour. His catholic majesty's renouncing all pretensions in favour of his subjects, to the right of fishing on the coasts of Newfoundland, was a puny sacrifice, something in appearance, but nothing in reality: for the claim was almost as obsolete as that of the English monarch to the dominions of France. The cession of Florida, with the forts of St. Augustine and Pensacola, to Great-Britain, was an object of much greater importance. It extended the British dominions along the coast to the mouth of the Mississippi. It removed an asylum for the slaves of the English colonies, who were continually making their escape to St. Augustine. It deprived the Spaniards of an easy avenue, through which they had it in their power to invade Georgia and Carolina; it afforded a large extent of improveable territory, a strong frontier, and a good port in the bay of Mexico, both for the convenience of trade, and annoyance of the Spaniards in any future contest. But neither the cession of Florida, nor the renunciation of the right to the fishery, nor the permission granted to the English logwood cutters, nor the evacuation of Portugal, nor all these articles together, can ever be esteemed equivalent to the restitution of the Havanna; for which, indeed, the Spanish monarch had no suitable compensation to make, without dismembering his kingdom, unless he had thrown into the scale with his other concessions, that of a free navigation, without search, to the British traders on the coast of New Spain. This was an advantage with which the people of England flattered their own imaginations: but it was a privilege which the court of Madrid could not grant, without opening the avenues of a contraband trade between the English and Spanish creoles, which would have been fatal to the commerce of Old Spain: because, in that case, his catholic majesty's American subjects would have supplied themselves at the first hand, with European commodities, from the trading ships of Great-Britain; and great part of the wealth of that country would have been conveyed immediately to England.

The crown of Spain was much favoured by the article which stipulates, that the conquests not included in the treaty either as cessions or restitutions, should be restored without compensation. Neither France nor Spain had any armament on foot, from which they could expect the least acquisition or success; whereas the ministry of England had great reason to believe that the island of Luconia was already reduced.

On the whole, the treaty, tho' perhaps it might have been more favourable in some articles, certainly confirmed great and solid advantages to Great-Britain; and will remain as an eternal monument of that moderation which forms the most amiable flower in the wreath of conquest.

France and England, having mutually withdrawn themselves from the war in Germany, the courts of Vienna and Berlin began to think in earnest of an accommodation. The empress-queen had but little hopes of prevailing, by her own strength alone, against a prince who had so long withstood the joint efforts of so many powerful confederates. On the other hand, the king of Prussia had no more subsidies to expect from Great-Britain, and little more to gain by contribution and compulsion in the provinces of Germany, which he had already, in a great measure, depopulated and impoverished. Perhaps he was sick of a war, which, in spite of all his activity and success, had exposed him to incredible fatigue, and repeated mortification. Both parties having expressed a desire of peace, conferences were opened at Hubertsburg, by the Austrian, Prussian, and Polish plenipotentiaries; and the articles were, in a little time, adjusted. The treaties of pacification between these powers imported, that the troops on all sides should be withdrawn from the countries which had been invaded and possessed in the course of the war; that peace should be re-established on the footing of former treaties, and each party sit down quietly with the loss it had sustained.

Such was the issue of a war, sanguinary beyond example, which had raged with uncommon fury in the four quarters of the globe; which had ruined many fair provinces; and, in the space of seven years, destroyed above a million of lives; which had cost Great-Britain, in particular, above two hundred and eighty thousand men, including a great number of brave and able officers, with an incredible quantity of treasure; and increased the burthen of her national debt, from fourscore, to one hundred and thirty millions sterling.

Of the State of Commerce, Learning, Agriculture, &c. from the Revolution to the Conclusion of the Peace in 1763.

C O M M E R C E.

THE commerce of Great Britain continued to increase during the whole course of this period; nor was this increase the effect of extraordinary encouragement. On the contrary, the necessities of government, the growing expences of the nation, and the continual augmentation of the public debt, obliged the legislature to hamper trade with manifold and grievous impositions; its increase, therefore, must have been owing to the natural progress of industry and adventure, extending themselves to that farthest line or limit beyond which they will not be able to advance: when the tide of traffick has flowed to its highest mark, it will then begin to recede in a gradual ebb, until it is shrunk within the narrow limits of its original channel. War, which naturally impedes the traffick of other nations, has opened new sources to the merchants of Great Britain: the superiority of her naval power hath crushed the navigation of France, her great rival in commerce; so that she supplies, on her own terms, all those foreign markets at which in time of peace she was undersold by that dangerous competitor. Thus her trade is augmented to a surprizing pitch; and this great augmentation alone has enabled her to maintain the war at such an enormous expence. Foreign nations will doubtless be surprized to learn, that above eight thousand ships are employed by the traders of Great Britain; and that the produce of the sinking fund, which is the overplus produced by all the different funds appropriated to defray the interest of the national debt, exceeds annually three millions sterling.

The following account of the trade to the East Indies, from a person who is far from being prejudiced in favour of the company, may possibly convey a juster idea of the nature and extent of the company's commerce than any thing hitherto said on this subject. The errors found in it will I hope be imputed to the true author, who has not thought proper to oblige the world with his name, or rather to the nature of the thing, in itself sufficiently dark and intricate, and besides most carefully hid from the eyes of the vulgar. His authorities however seem to be sufficiently solid, being chiefly the public accounts of the company's sales and other transactions, at least so far as regards his own plan, which was to represent this corporation as an institution highly prejudicial to the trade and commerce of Great Britain.

This traffic, says my author, employs yearly seventeen sail of fine capital ships, each of the burden of five hundred tons, by the company's account, mounting thirty guns, and manned with one hundred mariners. He then proceeds to give his readers the

My author takes notice, that the cargoes of seventeen ships are here allowed to be returned, whereas no more than fourteen were actually loaded outwards; he had before observed, that the manufactures in brass, copper, iron, pewter, and other materials, did not exceed the value of 300,000l. He likewise omits to charge any thing for insurance. There is moreover 5 per cent. allowed over the real prices at the candle, amounting as he says (by way of irony probably) to the small sum of 140,000l. All which particulars he says, will serve to answer all objections against his system. He then states the account of profit and loss on a voyage to India, thus,

LEARNING, LEARNED MEN, &c.

THE powers of the human mind were freely and fully exercised in this period. Considerable progress was made in mathematics and astronomy by divers individuals; among whom we number Newton, Halley, Wallis, Barrow, Flamsteed, Hudson, Sanderfon, Bradley, Maclaurin, Smith, and the two Simpsens.

Natural philosophy became a general study, and the new doctrine of electricity grew into fashion. Different methods were discovered for rendering sea-water potable and sweet; and divers useful hints were communicated to the publick by the learned doctor Stephen Hale, who directed all his researches and experiments to the benefit of society. The study of alchemy no longer prevailed; but the art of chemistry was perfectly understood, and assiduously applied to the purposes of sophistication.

The clergy of Great Britain were generally learned, pious, and exemplary. Atterbury, Sherlock, Hoadley, Secker, and Conybeare, were promoted to the first dignities of the church. Warburton, who had long signalized himself by the strength and boldness of his genius, his extensive capacity, and profound erudition, at length obtained the mitre. But these promotions were granted to reasons of state convenience, and personal interest, rather than as rewards of extraordinary merit. Many other ecclesiastics of worth and learning were totally overlooked. Nor was ecclesiastical merit confined to the established church. Many instances of extraordinary genius, unaffected piety, and universal moderation, appeared among the dissenting ministers of Great Britain and Ireland: among these we particularize the elegant, the primitive Foster; the learned, ingenious, and penetrating Leland.

The progress of reason, and free cultivation of the human mind, had not however entirely banished those ridiculous sects and schisms of which the kingdom had been formerly so productive. Imposture and fanaticism still hung upon the skirts of religion. Weak minds were seduced by the delusions of a superstition stiled Methodism, raised upon the affectation of superior sanctity, and maintained by pretensions to divine illumination. Many thousands in the lower ranks of life were infected with this species of enthusiasm, by the unwearied endeavours of a few obscure preachers; who propagated their doctrines to the most remote corners of the British dominions, and found means to lay the whole kingdom under contribution.

Fanaticism also formed a league with false philosophy. One Hutchinson, a visionary, intoxicated with the fumes of Rabbinical learning, pretended to deduce all demonstration from Hebrew roots, and to confine all human knowledge to the five books of Moses. His disciples became numerous after his death. With the Methodists, they denied the merit of good works; and bitterly inveighed against Newton as an ignorant pretender, who had presumed presumed to set up his own ridiculous chimæras in opposition to the sacred philosophy of the Pentateuch. But the most extraordinary sect which distinguished this reign was that of the Moravians, or Hernhutters, imported from Germany by count Zinzendorf, who might have been termed the Melchizedec of his followers, inasmuch as he assumed among them the three-fold character of prophet, priest, and king. They could not be so properly styled a sect as the disciples of an original, who had invented a new system of religion. Their chief adoration was paid to the Second Person in the Trinity: the First they treated with the most shocking neglect. Some of their tenets were indecent, and others ridiculously absurd. Their discipline was a strange mixture of devotion and impurity. Their exterior worship consisted of hymns, prayers, and sermons: the hymns extremely ludicrous, and often indecent, alluding to the side hole or wound which Christ received from a spear in his side, while he remained upon the cross. Their sermons frequently contained very gross incentives to the work of propagation. Their private exercises are said to have abounded with such rites and mysteries as we cannot explain, with any regard to decorum. They professed a community of goods; and were governed as one family, in temporals as well as spirituals, by a council, or kind of presbytery, in which the count, as their ordinary, presided. In cases of doubt, or great consequence, these pretended to consult the Saviour, and to decide from immediate inspiration; so that they boasted of being under the immediate direction of a Theocracy; though, in fact, they were slaves to the most dangerous kind of despotism: for as often as any individual of the community presumed to think for himself, or differ in opinion from the ordinary and his band of associates, the oracle decreed, that he should be instantly sent upon the mission which they had fixed in Greenland, or to the colony they had established in Pennsylvania. As the religionists consisted chiefly of manufacturers, who appeared very sober, orderly, and industrious; and their chief declared his intention of prosecuting works of public emolument, they obtained a settlement under a parliamentary sanction in England, where they soon made a considerable number of proselytes, before their principles were fully discovered and explained.

Many ingenious treatises on metaphysics and morality appeared in the course of this period; and a philosophical spirit of enquiry diffused itself to the farthest extremities of the united kingdom. Though few discoveries of importance were made in medicine, yet that art was well understood in all its different branches; and many of its professors distinguished themselves in other provinces of literature. Besides the Medical Essays of London and Edinburgh, the physician's library was enriched with many useful modern productions; with the works of the classical Freind, the elegant Mead, the accurate Huxham, and the philosophical Pringle. The art of midwifery was elucidated by science, reduced to fixed principles, and almost wholly consigned into the hands of men practitioners. The researches of anatomy were prosecuted to some curious discoveries by the ingenuity and dexterity of a Hunter and a Monro. The numerous hospitals in London contributed to the improvement of surgery, which was brought to perfection under the auspices of a Cheselden and a Sharpe. The advantages of agriculture, which had long flourished in England, extended themselves gradually to the most remote and barren provinces of the island.

The respectable patriots that form the Society established at London, have already done considerable service to their country, and will, it is hoped, still do more: a considerable number of machines having already been sent them, in consequence of their large premiums and bounties.

The mechanic powers were well understood, and judiciously applied to many useful machines of necessity and convenience. The mechanical arts had attained to all that perfection which they were capable of acquiring; but the avarice and oppression of contractors, obliged the handicraftsman to exert his ingenuity, not in finishing his work well, but in affording it cheap; in purchasing bad materials, and performing his task in a hurry; in concealing flaws, substituting shew for solidity, and sacrificing reputation to the thirst of lucre. Thus many of the English manufactures, being found slight and unserviceable, grew into discredit abroad; thus the art of producing them more perfect, may in time be totally lost at home. The cloths now made in England, are inferior in texture and fabric to those which were manufactured in the beginning of the century; and the same judgment may be pronounced upon almost every article of hardware. The razors, knives, scissars, hatchets, swords, and other edge utensils, prepared for exportation, are generally ill-tempered, half-finished, flawed or brittle; and the musquets, which are sold for seven or eight shillings a-piece to the exporter, so carelessly and unconscientiously prepared, they cannot be used without imminent danger of mutilation; accordingly one hardly meets with a negro man upon the coast of Guinea, in the neighbourhood of the British settlements, who has not been wounded or maimed in some member by the bursting of the English fire-arms. The advantages of this traffic, carried on at the expence of character and humanity, will naturally cease whenever those Africans can be supplied more honestly by the traders of any other nation.

Genius in writings spontaneously arose, and though neglected by the great, flourished under the culture of a public which had pretensions to taste, and piqued itself on encouraging literary merit.

Among the poets of this æra may be numbered John Philips, author of a didactic poem called Cyder, a performance of real merit, though the author lived and died in obscurity: William Congreve, celebrated for his comedies, which are not so famous for strength of character and power of humour, as for wit, elegance and regularity: Vanburgh, who wrote with more nature and fire, though with less art and precision: Steele, who in his comedies successfully engrafted modern characters on the antient drama: Fatquhar, who drew his pictures from fancy rather than from nature, and whose chief merit consists in the agreeable pertness and vivacity of his dialogues: Addison, who was excelled by none in the character of an essayist, either for style or matter: Swift, whose muse seems to have been mere misanthropy. He was a Cynic rather than a poet; and his natural dryness and sarcastic severity would have been displeasing, had not he qualified them by adopting the extravagant humour of Lucian and Rabelais: Prior, lively, familiar and amusing: Rowe, solemn, florid, and declamatory: Dryden, elegant, nervous, and entertaining: Pope, the prince of Lyric poetry, unrivalled in satire, ethics, and polished versification: the agreeable Parnell; the wild, the witty, and the whimsical Garth: Gay, whose fables may vie with those of Le Fontaine, in nature, humour, ease, and simplicity; and whose genius for pastoral was truly original. Young long survived a venerable monument of poetical talent. Thomson, the poet of the Seasons, displayed a luxuriancy of genius in describing the beauties of nature. Akenfide and Armstrong excelled in didactic poetry. Even the Epopœa did not disdain an English dress, but appeared to advantage in the Leonidas of Glover, and the Epigoniad of Wilkie. The public acknowledged a considerable share of dramatic merit in the tragedies of Young, Mallet, Home, and some other less distinguished authors. Besides these, great merit appeared in the detached performances of Johnson, Mason, Gray, the two Whiteheads, and the two Wartons, besides a great number of other bards who have sported in lyric poetry, and acquired the applause of their fellow citizens.

Dr. Atterbury and Dr. Clark distinguished themselves in divinity: and Newton shone unrivalled in philosophy. John Locke, the great restorer of human reason, may be said to have invented metaphysics, as Newton invented physics. Berkley, afterwards bishop of Cloyne, surpassed all his contemporaries in subtlety of reasoning and deduction.

Candidates for literary fame appeared even in the higher sphere of life, embellished by the nervous stile, superior sense, and extensive erudition of a Corke; by the delicate taste, the polished muse, and tender feelings of a Lyttleton. King shone unrivalled in Roman eloquence. Even the female sex distinguished themselves by their taste and ingenuity. Miss Carter rivalled the celebrated Dacier in learning and critical knowledge; and Mrs. Lennox signalized herself by many successful efforts of genius, both in poetry and prose. The genius of Cervantes was transfused into the novels of Fielding, who painted the characters, and ridiculed the follies of life with equal strength, humour, and propriety. The field of history and biography was cultivated by many writers of ability, among whom we distinguish the copious Guthrie, the circumstantial Ralph, the laborious Carte, the learned and elegant Robertson, the ingenious and penetrating Smollet, the comprehensive and philosophical Hume. Nor let us forget the merit conspicuous in Campbell, remarkable for candour, intelligence, and precision. Johnson, inferior to none in philosophy, philology, poetry, and classical learning, stands foremost as an essayist, justly admired for the dignity, strength, and variety of his stile, as well as for the agreeable manner in which he investigates the human heart, tracing every interesting emotion, and opening all the sources of morality. The laudable aim of inlisting the passions on the side of virtue, was successfully pursued by Richardson, in his Pamela, Clarissa, and Grandison; a species of writing equally new and extraordinary, where, mingled with much superfluity and impertinence, we find a sublime system of ethics, and amazing knowledge, and command of human nature. Many of the Greek and Roman classics made their appearance in English translations, which were favourably received as works of merit; among these we place Homer by Pope, Lucan by Rowe, Virgil by Dryden, and another translation by Pitt and Warton, Horace by Francis, Polybius by Hampton, and Sophocles by Francklyn. The several wars introduced a variety of military treatises, chiefly translated from the French language; and a free country like Great Britain, will always abound with political tracts and lucubrations. Every literary production of merit calculated for amusement or instruction, that appeared in any country or language of Christendom, was immediately imported, and naturalized among the English people. Never was the pursuit after knowledge so universal, literary merit more regarded, than in this æra by the body of the British nation; but it was honoured by no attention from the throne, and little indulgence did it reap from the liberality of particular patrons. The reign of queen Anne was propitious to the fortunes of Swift and Pope, who lived in all the happy pride of independence. Young, sequestered from courts and preferment, possessed a moderate benefice in the country, employing his time in a conscientious discharge of his ecclesiastical functions. Thomson, with the most benevolent heart that ever warmed the human breast, maintained a perpetual war with the difficulties of a narrow fortune. He enjoyed a place in Chancery by the bounty of lord Talbot, of which he was divested by the succeeding chancellor. He afterwards enjoyed a small pension from Frederick, prince of Wales, which was withdrawn in the sequel. About two years before his death he obtained a comfortable place; but he did not live to taste the blessing of easy circumstances, and died in debt.

None of the rest, whom we have named, enjoyed any share of the royal bounty, except W. Whitehead, who succeeded to the place of laureat at the death of Cibber; and some of them, whose merit was the most universally acknowledged, remained exposed to all the storms of indigence, and all the stings of mortification.

While queen Caroline, consort to George II. lived, some countenance was given to learning. She conversed with Newton and Clarke, and corresponded with Leibnitz. She took pains to acquire popularity: the royal family, on certain days, dined in public for the satisfaction of the people: the court was animated with a freedom of spirit and vivacity, which rendered it at once brilliant and agreeable. At her death that spirit began to languish; and a total stagnation of gaiety and good humour ensued. It was succeeded by a sullen calm, an ungracious reserve, and a still rotation of inspid forms, during the sequel of her husband's reign.

England was not defective in other arts that embellish and amuse. Musick became a fashionable study, and its professors generally caressed by the public. An Italian opera was maintained at a great expence, and well supplied with foreign performers. Private concerts were instituted in every corner of the metropolis. The compositions of Handel were universally admired, and he himself lived in affluence. It must be owned at the same time, that Geminiani was neglected, though his genius commanded esteem and veneration. Among the few natives of England who distinguished themselves by their talents in this art, Purcell, Green, Howard, Howard, Arne, and Boyce, were the most remarkable.

The British soil, which had hitherto been barren in the article of painting, now produced some artists of extraordinary merit. Hogarth excelled all the world in exhibiting the scenes of ordinary life; in humorous historical designs. Hudson, Reynolds, and Ramsay, distinguished themselves by their superior merit in portraits; a branch that was successfully cultivated by many other English painters. Wootton was famous for representing live animals in general; Seymour for race horses; Lambert, Willson, and the Smiths, for landscape; and Scot for sea pieces. Several spirited attempts were made on historical subjects; but little progress was made in the sublime parts of painting. Essays of this kind were discouraged by a false taste, founded upon a reprobation of British genius. The art of engraving was brought to perfection by Strange, and laudably practised by several other masters;

and great improvements were made in mezzotinto, miniature, and enamel. Many fair monuments of sculpture or statuary were raised by Ryssbrack, Roubilliac, and Wilton. Architecture, which had been cherished by the elegant taste of a Burlington, and a Wren, soon became a favourite study; and many magnificent edifices were reared in different parts of the kingdom. Ornaments were carved in wood, and moulded in stucco, with all the delicacy of execution; but a passion for novelty had introduced into gardening, building, and furniture, an absurd taste, equally void of beauty and convenience. Improvements in the liberal and useful arts, will doubtless be the consequence of that encouragement given to merit by the Society instituted for these purposes, which we have mentioned on another occasion. As for the Royal Society, it seems to have degenerated in its researches, and to have had very little share for half a century at least, in extending the influence of true philosophy.

Majesty the Catholick King, the most illustrious and most excellent lord, Don Jerome Grimaldi, Marquis de Grimaldi, Knight of the most Christian King's Orders, Gentleman of his Catholick Majesty's Bed-chamber in employment, and his Ambassador Extraordinary to his most Christian Majesty: his Sacred Majesty the Most Faithful King, the most illustrious and most excellent lord, Martin de Mello and Castro, Knight professed of the Order of Christ, of his Most Faithful Majesty's Council, and his Ambassador and Minister Plenipotentiary to his most Christian Majesty.

"Who, after having duly communicated to each other their full powers, in good form, have agreed upon the articles, the tenor of which is as follows:

"Art. I. There shall be a christian, universal and perpetual peace, as well by sea as by land, and a sincere and constant friendship shall be re-established between their Britannick, Most Christian, Catholick, and Most Faithful Majesties, and between their heirs and successors, kingdoms, dominions, provinces, countries, vassals, and subjects, of what quality or condition soever they be, without exceptions of places, or of persons: so that the high contracting parties shall give the greatest attention to maintain between themselves and their said dominions and subjects, this reciprocal friendship and correspondence, without permitting, on either side, any kind of hostilities, by sea or by land, to be committed from henceforth, for any cause, or under any pretence, whatsoever; and every thing shall be carefully avoided, which might hereafter prejudice the union happily re-established, applying themselves, on the contrary, on every occasion, to procure for each other whatever may contribute to their mutual glory, interests, and advantages, without giving any assistance or protection, directly or indirectly, to those who would cause any prejudice to either of the high contracting parties: there shall be a general oblivion of every thing that may have been done or committed before, or since, the commencement of the war which is just ended.

"Art. II. The treaties of Westphalia of 1648; those of Madrid between the two crowns of Great-Britain and Spain of 1667, and 1670; the treaties of peace of Nimeguen of 1678, and 1679; of Ryfwyck of 1697; those of peace and of commerce of Utrecht of 1713; that of Baden of 1714; that of the triple alliance of the Hague of 1717; that of the quadruple alliance of London of 1718; the treaty of peace of Vienna of 1738; the definitive treaty of Aix la Chapelle of 1748; and that of Madrid, between the crown of Great-Britain and Spain, of 1750; as well as the treaties between the crowns of Spain and Portugal, of the 13th of February 1668; of the 6th of February 1715; and of the 12th of February 1716; and that of the 11th of April 1713; between France and Portugal with the guarantees of Great-Britain; serve as a basis and foundation to the peace, and the present treaty: and for this purpose, they are all renewed and confirmed in the best form, as well as all the treaties in general, which subsisted between the high contracting parties before the war, as if they were inserted here word for word; so that they are to be exactly observed, for the future, in their whole tenor, and religiously executed on all sides, in all their points, which shall not be derogated from by the present treaty; notwithstanding all that may have been stipulated to the contrary by any of the high contracting parties: and all the said parties declare, that they will not suffer any privilege, favour, or indulgence, to subsist, contrary to the treaties above confirmed, except what shall have been agreed and stipulated by the present treaty.

"Art. III. All the prisoners made on all sides, as well by land as by sea, and the hostages carried away, or given during the war, and to this day, shall be restored, without ransom, six weeks at latest, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, each crown respectively paying the advances which shall have been made for the subsistence and maintenance of their prisoners, by the sovereign of the country where they shall have been detained, according to the attested receipts and estimates, and other authentic vouchers, which shall be furnished on one side and the other: and securities shall be reciprocally given for the payment of the debts which the prisoners shall have contracted in the countries where they have been detained, until their entire liberty. And all the ships of war and merchant-vessels, which shall have been taken since the expiration of the terms agreed upon for the cessation of hostilities by sea, shall be likewise restored bona fide, with all their crews and cargoes: and the execution of this article shall be proceeded upon immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty.

"Art. IV. His most Christian Majesty renounces all pretensions which he has heretofore formed, or might form, to Nova Scotia, or Acadia in all its parts; and guarantees the whole of it, and with it all its dependencies, to the King of Great-Britain: moreover, his Most Christian Majesty cedes and guaranties to his said Britannick Majesty, in full right, Canada, with all its dependencies, as well as the island of Cape Breton, and all the other islands and coasts in the gulph and river St. Laurence, and, in general, every thing that depends on the said countries, lands, islands, and coasts, with the sovereignty, property, possession, and all rights acquired by treaty or otherwise, which the Most Christian King, and the crown of France, have had, till now, over the said countries, islands, lands, places, coasts, and their inhabitants, so that the Most Christian King cedes and makes over the whole to the said King, and to the crown of Great-Britain, and that in the most ample manner and form, without restriction, and without any liberty to depart from the said cession and guaranty, under any pretence, or to disturb Great-Britain in the possessions above-mentioned. His Britannick Majesty, on his side, agrees to grant the liberty of the Catholick religion to the inhabitants of Canada: he will, consequently, give the most precise and most effectual orders, that his new Roman Catholick subjects may profess the worship of their religion, according to the rites of the Romish church, as far as the laws of Great-Britain permit. His Britannick Majesty further agrees, that the French inhabitants, or others who had been subjects of the Most Christian King in Canada, may retire, with all safety and freedom, wherever they shall think proper, and may sell their estates, provided vided it be to the subjects of his Britannick Majesty, and bring away their effects, as well as their persons, without being restrained in their emigration, under any pretence whatsoever, except that of debts, or of criminal prosecutions: the term limited for this emigration shall be fixed to the space of eighteen months, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratification of the present treaty.

“ V. The subjects of France shall have the liberty of fishing and drying on a part of the coasts of the island of Newfoundland, such as it is specified in the XIIIth article of the treaty of Utrecht; which article is renewed and confirmed by the present treaty (except what relates to the island of Cape Breton, as well as to the other islands and coasts in the mouth and in the gulph of St. Laurence): and his Britannick Majesty consents to leave to the subjects of the most Christian King the liberty of fishing in the gulph St. Laurence, on condition that the subjects of France do not exercise the said fishery, but at the distance of three leagues from all the coasts belonging to Great-Britain, as well those of the continent, as those of the islands situated in the said gulph St. Laurence. And as to what relates to the fishery on the coasts of the island of Cape Breton out of the said gulph, the subjects of the most Christian King shall not be permitted to exercise the said fishery, but at the distance of fifteen leagues from the coasts of the island of Cape Breton; and the fishery on the coasts of Nova Scotia or Acadia, and every where else out of the said gulph, shall remain on the foot of former treaties.

“ Art. VI. The King of Great-Britain cedes the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, in full right, to his Most Christian Majesty, to serve as shelter to the French fishermen: and his said Most Christian Majesty engages not to fortify the said islands; to erect no buildings upon them, but merely for the convenience of the fishery; and to keep upon them a guard of fifty men only for the police.

“ Art. VII. In order to re-establish peace on solid and durable foundations, and to remove for ever all subject of dispute with regard to the limits of the British and French territories on the continent of America; it is agreed, that, for the future, the confines between the dominions of his Britannick Majesty and those of his Most Christian Majesty, in that part of the world, shall be fixed irrevocably by a line drawn along the middle of the river Mississippi, from its source to the river Iberville, and from thence, by a line drawn along the middle of this river, and the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, to the sea; and for this purpose, the Most Christian King cedes in full right, and guaranties to his Britannick Majesty, the river and port of the Mobile, and every thing which he possesses, or ought to possess, on the left side of the river Mississippi, except the town of New Orleans, and the island in which it is situated, which shall remain to France; provided that the navigation of the river Mississippi shall be equally free, as well to the subjects of Great-Britain, as to those of France, in its whole breadth and length, from its source to the sea, and expressly that part which is between the said island of New Orleans, and the right bank of that river, as well as the passage both in and out of its mouth. It is farther stipulated, that the vessels belonging to the subjects of either nation, shall not be stopped, visited, or subjected to the payment of any duty whatsoever. The stipulations inserted in the IVth article, in favour of the inhabitants of Canada, shall also take place with regard to the inhabitants of the countries ceded by this article.

“ Art. VIII. The King of Great-Britain shall restore to France the islands of Guadaloupe, of Marie Galante, of Desirade, of Martinico, and of Belleisle; and the fortresses of these islands shall be restored in the same condition they were in, when they were conquered by the British arms; provided that his Britannick Majesty's subjects who shall have settled in the said islands, or those who shall have any commercial affairs to settle there, or in the other places restored to France by the present treaty, shall have liberty to sell their lands and their estates, to settle their affairs, to recover their debts, and bring away their effects, as well as their persons, on board vessels, which they shall be permitted to send to the said islands, and other places restored as above, and which shall serve for this use only, without being restrained on account of their religion, or under any other pretence whatsoever, except that of debts, or of criminal prosecutions: and for this purpose the term of eighteen months is allowed to his Britannick Majesty's subjects, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty: but as the liberty granted to his Britannick Majesty's subjects, to bring away their persons and their effects, in vessels of their nation, may be liable to abuses, if precautions were not taken to prevent them; it has been expressly agreed between his Britannick Majesty and his Most Christian Majesty, that the number of English vessels, which shall have leave to go to the said islands and places restored to France, shall be limited, as well as the number of tons of each one; that they shall go in ballast; shall set sail at a fixed time; and shall make one voyage only, all the effects belonging to the English being to be embarked at the same time. It has been further agreed, that his Most Christian Majesty shall cause the necessary passports to be given to the said vessels; that, for the greater security, it shall be allowed to place two French clerks, or guards, in each of the said vessels, which shall be visited in the landing places and ports of the said islands and places restored to France, and that the merchandize which shall be found therein shall be confiscated.

“ Art. IX. The Most Christian King cedes and guaranties to his Britannick Majesty, in full right, the islands of Grenada, and of the Grenadines, with the same stipulations in favour of the inhabitants of this colony, inserted in the IVth article for those of Canada: and the partition of the islands called Neutral, is agreed and fixed, so that those of St. Vincent, Dominica, and Tobago, shall remain in full right to Great-Britain, and that of St. Lucia shall be delivered to France, to enjoy the same likewise in full right; and the high contracting parties guaranty the partition so stipulated.

“ Art. X. His Britannick Majesty shall restore to France the island of Goree in the condition it was in when conquered: and his Most Christian Majesty cedes in full right, and guaranties to the King of Great-Britain, the river Senegal, with the forts and factories of St. Lewis, Podor, and Galam;

and with all the rights and dependencies of the said river Senegal.

“ Art. XI. In the East-Indies, Great-Britain shall restore to France, in the condition they are now in, the different factories which that crown possessed, as well on the coast of Coromandel and Orixá, as on that of Malabar, as also in Bengal, at the beginning of the year 1749. And his Most Christian Majesty renounces all pretensions to the acquisition which he had made on the coast of Coromandel and Orixá, since the said beginning of the year 1749. His Most Christian Majesty shall restore on his side, all that he may have conquered from Great-Britain, in the East-Indies, during the present war; and will expressly cause Nattal and Tapanouilly in the island of Sumatra, to be restored; he engages further not to erect fortifications, or to keep troops, in any part of the dominions of the Subah of Bengal. And in order to preserve future peace on the coast of Coromandel and Orixá, the English and French shall acknowledge Mahomet Ally Khan for lawful Nabob of the Carnatick, and Salabat Jíng for lawful Subah of the Decan; and both parties shall renounce all demands and pretensions of satisfaction, with which they might charge each other, or their Indian allies, for their depredations, or pillage, committed, on the one side or on the other, during the war.

“ Art. XII. The island of Minorca shall be restored to his Britannick Majesty, as well as Fort St. Philip, in the same condition they were in, when conquered by the arms of the Most Christian King; and with the artillery which was there, when the said island and the said fort were taken.

“ Art. XIII. The town and port of Dunkirk shall be put into the state fixed by the last treaty of Aix la Chapelle, and by former treaties. The cunette shall be destroyed immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, as well as the forts and batteries which defend the entrance on the side of the sea; and provision shall be made, at the same time, for the wholesomeness of the air, and for the health of the inhabitants, by some other means, to the satisfaction of the King of Great-Britain.

“ Art. XIV. France shall restore all the countries belonging to the electorate of Hanover, to the Landgrave of Hesse, to the Duke of Brunswick, and to the Count of La Lippe Buckebourg, which are or shall be occupied by his Most Christian Majesty's arms: the fortresses of these different countries shall be restored in the same condition they were in when conquered by the French arms; and the pieces of artillery, which shall have been carried elsewhere, shall be replaced by the same number, of the same bore, weight, and metal.

“ Art. XV. In case the stipulations contained in the XIIIth article of the preliminaries, should not be completed at the time of the signature of the present treaty, as well with regard to the evacuations to be made by the armies of France of the fortresses of Cleves, Wesel, Guelders, and of all the countries belonging to the King of Prussia, as with regard to the evacuations to be made by the British and French armies of the countries which they occupy in Westphalia, Lower Saxony, on the Lower Rhine, Upper Rhine, and in all the empire, and to the retreat of the troops into the dominions of their respective sovereigns: their Britannick and Most Christian Majesties promise to proceed, bona fide, with all the dispatch the case will permit of, to the said evacuations, the entire completion whereof they stipulate before the 15th of March next, or sooner if it can be done: and their Britannick and Most Christian Majesties further engage and promise to each other, not to furnish any succours, of any kind, to their respective allies who shall continue engaged in the war in Germany.

“ Art. XVI. The decision of the prizes made in time of peace, by the subjects of Great Britain, on the Spaniards, shall be referred to the courts of justice of the admiralty of Great-Britain, conformably to the rules established among all nations, so that the validity of the said prizes, between the British and Spanish nations, shall be decided and judged, according to the law of nations, and according to treaties in the courts of justice of the nation who shall have made the capture.

“ Art. XVII. His Britannick Majesty shall cause to be demolished all the fortifications which his subjects shall have erected in the Bay of Honduras, and other places of the territory of Spain in that part of the world, four months after the ratification of the present treaty: and his Catholick Majesty shall not permit his Britannick Majesty's subjects, or their workmen, to be disturbed, or molested, under any pretence whatsoever, in the said places, in their occupation of cutting, loading, and carrying away, logwood: and for this purpose they may build without hindrance, and occupy without interruption, the houses and magazines which are necessary for them, for their families, and for their effects: and his Catholick Majesty assures to them, by this article, the full enjoyment of those advantages, and powers, on the Spanish coasts and territories, as above stipulated, immediately after the ratification of the present treaty.

“ Art. XVIII. His Catholick Majesty desists, as well for himself as for his successors, from all pretensions which he may have formed in favour of the Guipuscoans, and other his subjects, to the right of fishing in the neighbourhood of the island of Newfoundland.

“ Art. XIX. The King of Great-Britain shall restore to Spain all the territory which he has conquered in the island of Cuba, with the fortress of the Havanna; and this fortress, as well as all the other fortresses of the said island, shall be restored in the same condition they were in when conquered by his Britannick Majesty's arms; provided that his Britannick Majesty's subjects who shall have settled in the said island, restored to Spain by the present treaty, or those who shall have any commercial affairs to settle there, shall have liberty to sell their lands and their estates, to settle their affairs, to recover their debts, and to bring away their effects as well as their persons, on board vessels which they shall be permitted to send to the said island restored as above, and which shall serve for that use only, without being restrained on account of their religion, or under any pretence whatsoever, except that of debts, or of criminal prosecution: and for this purpose the term of eighteen months is allowed to his Britannick Majesty's subjects, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty: but as the liberty granted to his Britannick Majesty's subjects, to bring away their persons persons and their effects, in vessels of their nation, may be liable to abuses, if precautions are not taken to prevent them; it has been expressly agreed between his Britannick Majesty and his Catholick Majesty, that the number of English vessels, which shall have leave to go to the said island restored to Spain, shall be limited, as well as the number of tons of each one; that they shall go in ballast; shall set sail at a fixed time; and shall make one voyage only; all the effects belonging to the English being to be embarked at the same time: It has been further agreed, that his Catholick Majesty shall cause the necessary passports to be given to the said vessels; that, for the greater security, it shall be allowed to place two Spanish clerks, or guards, in each of the said vessels, which shall be visited in the landing-places, and ports of the said island restored to Spain, and that the merchandize, which shall be found therein, shall be confiscated.

“ Art. XX. In consequence of the restitution stipulated in the preceding article, his Catholick Majesty cedes and guaranties, in full right, to his Britannick Majesty, Florida, with Fort St. Augustin, and the bay of Pensacola, as well as all that Spain possesses on the continent of North-America, to the east or to the south-east of the river Mississippi, and, in general, every thing that depends on the said countries and lands, with the sovereignty, property, possession, and all rights, acquired by treaties, or otherwise, which the Catholick King, and the crown of Spain have had, till now, over the said countries, lands, places, and other inhabitants; so that the Catholick King cedes and makes over the whole to the said King, and to the crown of Great-Britain, and that in the most ample manner and form. His Britannick Majesty agrees, on his side, to grant to the inhabitants of the countries above ceded, the liberty of the Catholic religion: he will consequently give the most express and the most effectual orders that his new Roman Catholick subjects may profess the worship of their religion, according to the rites of the Romish church, as far as the laws of Great-Britain permit: his Britannick Majesty farther agrees, that the Spanish inhabitants, or others who had been subjects of the Catholick King in the said countries, may retire, with all safety and freedom, wherever they think proper; and may sell their estates, provided it be to his Britannick Majesty's subjects, and bring away their effects, as well as their persons without being restrained in their emigration, under any pretence whatsoever, except that of debts or of criminal prosecutions; the term limited for this emigration being fixed to the space of eighteen months, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty. It is moreover stipulated, that his Catholick Majesty shall have power to cause all the effects that may belong to him to be brought away, whether it be artillery, or other things.

“ Art. XXI. The French and Spanish troops shall evacuate all the territories, lands, towns, places, and castles, of his most Faithful Majesty in Europe, without any reserve, which shall have been conquered by the armies of France and Spain, and shall restore them in the same condition they were in when conquered, with the same artillery, and ammunition, which were found there: and with regard to the Portuguese colonies in America, Africa, or in the East-Indies, if any change shall have happened there, all things shall be restored on the same footing they were in, and conformably to the preceding treaties, which subsisted between the courts of France, Spain, and Portugal, before the present war.

“ Art. XXII. All the papers, letters, documents, and archives, which were found in the countries, territories, towns, and places, that are restored, and those belonging to the countries ceded, shall be respectively and bona fide, delivered, or furnished at the same time, if possible, that possession is taken, or, at latest, four months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, in whatever places the said papers or documents may be found.

“ Art. XXIII. All the countries and territories, which may have been conquered, in whatsoever part of the world, by the arms of their Britannick and Most Faithful Majesties, as well as by those of their Most Christian and Catholick Majesties, which are not included in the present treaty, either under the title of cessions, or under the title of restitutions, shall be restored without difficulty, and without requiring any compensation.

“ Art. XXIV. As it is necessary to assign a fixed epoch for the restitutions, and the evacuations, to be made by each of the high contracting parties; it is agreed, that the British and French troops shall complete, before the 15th of March next, all that shall remain to be executed of the XIth and XIIth articles of the preliminaries, signed the 3d day of November last, with regard to the evacuation to be made in the empire, or elsewhere. The island of Belleisle shall be evacuated six weeks after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, or sooner, if it can be done. Guadaloupe, Desirade, Marie Galante, Martinico, and St. Lucia, three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, or sooner, if it can be done. Great-Britain shall likewise, at the end of three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, or sooner if it can be done, enter into possession of the river and port of the Mobile, and of all that is to form the limits of the territory of Great-Britain, on the side of the river Mississippi, as they are specified in the VIIth article. The island of Goree shall be evacuated by Great-Britain, three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty; and the island of Minorca, by France, at the same epoch, or sooner if it can be done: and according to the conditions of the VIth article, France shall likewise enter into possession of the islands of St. Peter and of Miquelon, at the end of three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty. The factories in the East-Indies shall be restored six months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, or sooner, if it can be done. The fortress of the Havanna, with all that has been conquered in the island of Cuba, shall be restored three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, or sooner, if it can be done: and, at the same time, Great-Britain shall enter into possession of the country ceded by Spain, according to the XXth article. All the places and countries of his Most Faithful Majesty in Europe, shall be restored imme-immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty; and the Portuguese colonies, which may have been conquered, shall be restored in the space of three months in the West-Indies, and of six months in the East-Indies, after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, or sooner if it can be done. All the fortresses, the restitution whereof is stipulated above, shall be restored with the artillery and ammunition which were found there at the time of the conquest. In consequence whereof, the necessary orders shall be sent by each of the high contracting parties, with reciprocal passports for the ships that shall carry them, immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty.

“ Art. XXV. His Britannick Majesty, as Elector of Brunswick Lunenbourg, as well for himself, as for his heirs and successors, and all the dominions and possessions of his said Majesty in Germany, are included and guaranteed by the present treaty of peace.

“ Art. XXVI. Their Sacred Britannick, Most Christian, Catholick, and Most Faithful Majesties, promise to observe, sincerely and bona fide, all the articles contained and settled in the present treaty; and they will not suffer the same to be infringed, directly or indirectly, by their respective subjects; and the said high contracting parties, generally and reciprocally, guaranty to each other all the stipulations of the present treaty.

“ Art. XXVII. The solemn ratifications of the present treaty, expedited in good and due form, shall be exchanged in this city of Paris between the high contracting parties, in the space of a month, or sooner if possible, to be computed from the day of the signature of the present treaty.

“ In witness whereof, we the underwritten, their Ambassadors Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary, have signed with our hand, in their name, and in virtue of our full powers, the present Definitive Treaty, and have caused the seal of our arms to be put thereto.”

SEPARATE ARTICLES.

I. SOME of the titles made use of by the contracting powers, either in their full powers and other acts, during the course of the negotiation, or in the preamble of the present treaty, not being generally acknowledged; it has been agreed, That no prejudice shall ever result therefrom to any of the said contracting parties, and that the titles taken or omitted on either side, on occasion of the said negotiation and of the present treaty, shall not be cited or quoted as a precedent.

II. It has been agreed and determined, That the French language, made use of in all the copies of the present treaty, shall not become an example, which may be alledged, or made a precedent of, or prejudice, in any manner, any of the contracting powers; and that they shall conform themselves, for the future, to what has been observed, and ought to be observed, with regard to, and on the part of, powers who are used, and have a right, to give and to receive copies of like treaties in another language than French; the present treaty having still the same force and effect, as if the aforesaid custom had been therein observed.

III. Though the King of Portugal has not signed the present definitive treaty, their Britannick, Most Christian, and Catholick Majesties, acknowledge, nevertheless, that his Most Faithful Majesty is formally included therein as a contracting party, and as if he had expressly signed the said treaty; consequently, their Britannick, Most Christian, and Catholick Majesties, respectively and conjointly, promise to his Most Faithful Majesty, in the most express and most binding manner, the execution of all and every the clauses contained in the said treaty, on his act of accession.

The present separate articles shall have the same force as if they were inserted in the treaty.

Declaration of his Most Christian Majesty's Plenipotentiary, with regard to the debts due to the Canadians.

THE King of Great-Britain having desired, that the payment of the letters of exchange and bills which have been delivered to the Canadians for the necessaries furnished to the French troops, should be secured, his Most Christian Majesty, entirely disposed to render to every one that justice which is legally due to them, has declared, and does declare, that the said bills and letters of exchange shall be punctually paid, agreeably to a liquidation made in a convenient time, according to the distance of the places, and to what shall be possible; taking care, however, that the bills and letters of exchange, which the French subjects may have at the time of this declaration, be not confounded with the bills and letters of exchange which are in the possession of the new subjects of the King of Great-Britain.

In witness whereof, we the underwritten minister of his Most Christian Majesty, duly authorized for this purpose, have signed the present declaration, and caused the seal of our arms to be put thereto.

Declaration of his Britannick Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, with regard to the limits of Bengal in the East-Indies.

WE the underwritten Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the King of Great-Britain, in order to prevent all subject of dispute on account of the limits of the dominions of the Subah of Bengal, as well as of the coast of Coromandel, and Orixá, declare, in the name, and by order of his said Britannick Majesty, that the said dominions of the Subah of Bengal shall be reputed not to extend farther than Yanaon exclusively, and that Yanaon shall be considered as included in the north part of the coast of Coromandel or Orixá.

In witness whereof, &c.

The

The reader will, at one glance, perceive that these terms are more advantageous to Great Britain and her allies, than those which were agreed to by the late minister. He must determine for himself, whether they were such as she ought to have insisted upon, in consequence of her additional successes. Certainly they were more favourable for France and Spain, than those powers could have reasonably expected to enjoy, after the losses they had sustained. It must be acknowledged that Great-Britain, by extending the frontiers of Canada to the middle of the Mississippi, gained a large tract of fertile country lying on the banks of that river, besides the advantage of a free navigation upon it, and the possession of the port of Mobile: but, in order to secure the English American colonies from all possibility of disturbance from the French, that restless nation ought to have been expelled from New Orleans, and the whole country of Louisiana; for, while they remain in this settlement, at liberty to penetrate by the river to the remote tribes of Indians, they will still maintain their influence among those savages: they will supply them with necessaries, consequently weaken their dependence upon the English; and employ their arts of insinuation upon them so effectually, as to have it always in their power to hunt them upon the defenceless back-settlements of the British colonists. It does not appear that the British ministry were well acquainted with the importance of this article.

England, by this peace, likewise gained an accession, in France's ceding to her the island of Grenada, which, when fully cultivated and peopled, may be of some consequence. She moreover acquired the unsettled islands of Dominica, Tobago, and St. Vincent; but yielded to France the island of St. Lucie, said to be worth all the rest. She retains the settlement of Senegal on the coast of Africa, by which she engrosses the whole gum trade of that country; as for the rock of Goree, which she restored, it was no great sacrifice. The article that relates to the East-Indies, was dictated by the directors of the English company; and surely the French have no reason to complain of its severity, as it restores them to the possession of all the places they had at the beginning of the war, on condition that they shall maintain neither forts nor forces in the kingdom of Bengal; thus they will enjoy all their former advantages in trade, without the temptation and expence of forming schemes of conquest and dominion.

As the treaty makes no mention of the ships taken from the subjects of France before the declaration of war, in all probability, the king of Great-Britain agreed that their owners should be indemnified; a concession which barely atones for a measure which (whatever may have been alledged in its justification) will always be considered by the candid and impartial, as an act of violence and rapine, that strikes at the very root of the law of nations, which, for the interests of humanity in general, ought to be held sacred, even amidst the warmest transports of animosity and resentment.

The liberty of cutting logwood in the bay of Honduras, granted to the subjects of Great-Britain, was undoubtedly a great point gained in their favour; but their obliging themselves to demolish their fortifications on that coast, was a tacit acknowledgement that the privilege was not founded upon right, but derived from favour. His catholic majesty's renouncing all pretensions in favour of his subjects, to the right of fishing on the coasts of Newfoundland, was a puny sacrifice, something in appearance, but nothing in reality: for the claim was almost as obsolete as that of the English monarch to the dominions of France. The cession of Florida, with the forts of St. Augustine and Pensacola, to Great-Britain, was an object of much greater importance. It extended the British dominions along the coast to the mouth of the Mississippi. It removed an asylum for the slaves of the English colonies, who were continually making their escape to St. Augustine. It deprived the Spaniards of an easy avenue, through which they had it in their power to invade Georgia and Carolina; it afforded a large extent of improveable territory, a strong frontier, and a good port in the bay of Mexico, both for the convenience of trade, and annoyance of the Spaniards in any future contest. But neither the cession of Florida, nor the renunciation of the right to the fishery, nor the permission granted to the English logwood cutters, nor the evacuation of Portugal, nor all these articles together, can ever be esteemed equivalent to the restitution of the Havanna; for which, indeed, the Spanish monarch had no suitable compensation to make, without dismembring his kingdom, unless he had thrown into the scale with his other concessions, that of a free navigation, without search, to the British traders on the coast of New Spain. This was an advantage with which the people of England flattered their own imaginations: but it was a privilege which the court of Madrid could not grant, without opening the avenues of a contraband trade between the English and Spanish creoles, which would have been fatal to the commerce of Old Spain: because, in that case, his catholic majesty's American subjects would have supplied themselves at the first hand, with European commodities, from the trading ships of Great-Britain; and great part of the wealth of that country would have been conveyed immediately to England.

The crown of Spain was much favoured by the article which stipulates, that the conquests not included in the treaty either as cessions or restitutions, should be restored without compensation. Neither France nor Spain had any armament on foot, from which they could expect the least acquisition or success; whereas the ministry of England had great reason to believe that the island of Luconia was already reduced.

On the whole, the treaty, tho' perhaps it might have been more favourable in some articles, certainly confirmed great and solid advantages to Great-Britain; and will remain as an eternal monument of that moderation which forms the most amiable flower in the wreath of conquest.

France and England, having mutually withdrawn themselves from the war in Germany, the courts of Vienna and Berlin began to think in earnest of an accommodation. The empress-queen had but little hopes of prevailing, by her own strength alone, against a prince who had so long withstood the joint efforts of so many powerful confederates. On the other hand, the king of Prussia had no more subsidies to expect from Great-Britain, and little more to gain by contribution and compulsion in the provinces of Germany, which he had already, in a great measure, depopulated and impoverished. Perhaps he was sick of a war, which, in spite of all his activity and success, had exposed him to incredible fatigue, and repeated mortification. Both parties having expressed a desire of peace, conferences were opened at Hubertsburg, by the Austrian, Prussian, and Polish plenipotentiaries; and the articles were, in a little time, adjusted. The treaties of pacification between these powers imported, that the troops on all sides should be withdrawn from the countries which had been invaded and possessed in the course of the war; that peace should be re-established on the footing of former treaties, and each party sit down quietly with the loss it had sustained.

Such was the issue of a war, sanguinary beyond example, which had raged with uncommon fury in the four quarters of the globe; which had ruined many fair provinces; and, in the space of seven years, destroyed above a million of lives; which had cost Great-Britain, in particular, above two hundred and eighty thousand men, including a great number of brave and able officers, with an incredible quantity of treasure; and increased the burthen of her national debt, from fourscore, to one hundred and thirty millions sterling.

Of the State of Commerce, Learning, Agriculture, &c. from the Revolution to the Conclusion of the Peace in 1763.

C O M M E R C E.

THE commerce of Great Britain continued to increase during the whole course of this period; nor was this increase the effect of extraordinary encouragement. On the contrary, the necessities of government, the growing expences of the nation, and the continual augmentation of the public debt, obliged the legislature to hamper trade with manifold and grievous impositions; its increase, therefore, must have been owing to the natural progress of industry and adventure, extending themselves to that farthest line or limit beyond which they will not be able to advance: when the tide of traffick has flowed to its highest mark, it will then begin to recede in a gradual ebb, until it is shrunk within the narrow limits of its original channel. War, which naturally impedes the traffick of other nations, has opened new sources to the merchants of Great Britain: the superiority of her naval power hath crushed the navigation of France, her great rival in commerce; so that she supplies, on her own terms, all those foreign markets at which in time of peace she was undersold by that dangerous competitor. Thus her trade is augmented to a surprizing pitch; and this great augmentation alone has enabled her to maintain the war at such an enormous expence. Foreign nations will doubtless be surprized to learn, that above eight thousand ships are employed by the traders of Great Britain; and that the produce of the sinking fund, which is the overplus produced by all the different funds appropriated to defray the interest of the national debt, exceeds annually three millions sterling.

The following account of the trade to the East Indies, from a person who is far from being prejudiced in favour of the company, may possibly convey a juster idea of the nature and extent of the company's commerce than any thing hitherto said on this subject. The errors found in it will I hope be imputed to the true author, who has not thought proper to oblige the world with his name, or rather to the nature of the thing, in itself sufficiently dark and intricate, and besides most carefully hid from the eyes of the vulgar. His authorities however seem to be sufficiently solid, being chiefly the public accounts of the company's sales and other transactions, at least so far as regards his own plan, which was to represent this corporation as an institution highly prejudicial to the trade and commerce of Great Britain.

This traffic, says my author, employs yearly seventeen sail of fine capital ships, each of the burden of five hundred tons, by the company's account, mounting thirty guns, and manned with one hundred mariners. He then proceeds to give his readers the

My author takes notice, that the cargoes of seventeen ships are here allowed to be returned, whereas no more than fourteen were actually loaded outwards; he had before observed, that the manufactures in brass, copper, iron, pewter, and other materials, did not exceed the value of 300,000l. He likewise omits to charge any thing for insurance. There is moreover 5 per cent. allowed over the real prices at the candle, amounting as he says (by way of irony probably) to the small sum of 140,000l. All which particulars he says, will serve to answer all objections against his system. He then states the account of profit and loss on a voyage to India, thus,

LEARNING, LEARNED MEN, &c.

THE powers of the human mind were freely and fully exercised in this period. Considerable progress was made in mathematics and astronomy by divers individuals; among whom we number Newton, Halley, Wallis, Barrow, Flamsteed, Hudson, Sanderfon, Bradley, Maclaurin, Smith, and the two Simpsons.

Natural philosophy became a general study, and the new doctrine of electricity grew into fashion. Different methods were discovered for rendering sea-water potable and sweet; and divers useful hints were communicated to the publick by the learned doctor Stephen Hale, who directed all his researches and experiments to the benefit of society. The study of alchemy no longer prevailed; but the art of chemistry was perfectly understood, and assiduously applied to the purposes of sophistication.

The clergy of Great Britain were generally learned, pious, and exemplary. Atterbury, Sherlock, Hoadley, Secker, and Conybeare, were promoted to the first dignities of the church. Warburton, who had long signalized himself by the strength and boldness of his genius, his extensive capacity, and profound erudition, at length obtained the mitre. But these promotions were granted to reasons of state convenience, and personal interest, rather than as rewards of extraordinary merit. Many other ecclesiastics of worth and learning were totally overlooked. Nor was ecclesiastical merit confined to the established church. Many instances of extraordinary genius, unaffected piety, and universal moderation, appeared among the dissenting ministers of Great Britain and Ireland: among these we particularize the elegant, the primitive Foster; the learned, ingenious, and penetrating Leland.

The progress of reason, and free cultivation of the human mind, had not however entirely banished those ridiculous sects and schisms of which the kingdom had been formerly so productive. Imposture and fanaticism still hung upon the skirts of religion. Weak minds were seduced by the delusions of a superstition stiled Methodism, raised upon the affectation of superior sanctity, and maintained by pretensions to divine illumination. Many thousands in the lower ranks of life were infected with this species of enthusiasm, by the unwearied endeavours of a few obscure preachers; who propagated their doctrines to the most remote corners of the British dominions, and found means to lay the whole kingdom under contribution.

Fanaticism also formed a league with false philosophy. One Hutchinson, a visionary, intoxicated with the fumes of Rabbinical learning, pretended to deduce all demonstration from Hebrew roots, and to confine all human knowledge to the five books of Moses. His disciples became numerous after his death. With the Methodists, they denied the merit of good works; and bitterly inveighed against Newton as an ignorant pretender, who had presumed presumed to set up his own ridiculous chimeras in opposition to the sacred philosophy of the Pentateuch. But the most extraordinary sect which distinguished this reign was that of the Moravians, or Hernhutters, imported from Germany by count Zinzendorf, who might have been termed the Melchizedec of his followers, inasmuch as he assumed among them the three-fold character of prophet, priest, and king. They could not be so properly styled a sect as the disciples of an original, who had invented a new system of religion. Their chief adoration was paid to the Second Person in the Trinity: the First they treated with the most shocking neglect. Some of their tenets were indecent, and others ridiculously absurd. Their discipline was a strange mixture of devotion and impurity. Their exterior worship consisted of hymns, prayers, and sermons: the hymns extremely ludicrous, and often indecent, alluding to the side hole or wound which Christ received from a spear in his side, while he remained upon the cross. Their sermons frequently contained very gross incentives to the work of propagation. Their private exercises are said to have abounded with such rites and mysteries as we cannot explain, with any regard to decorum. They professed a community of goods; and were governed as one family, in temporals as well as spirituals, by a council, or kind of presbytery, in which the count, as their ordinary, presided. In cases of doubt, or great consequence, these pretended to consult the Saviour, and to decide from immediate inspiration; so that they boasted of being under the immediate direction of a Theocracy; though, in fact, they were slaves to the most dangerous kind of despotism: for as often as any individual of the community presumed to think for himself, or differ in opinion from the ordinary and his band of associates, the oracle decreed, that he should be instantly sent upon the mission which they had fixed in Greenland, or to the colony they had established in Pennsylvania. As the religionists consisted chiefly of manufacturers, who appeared very sober, orderly, and industrious; and their chief declared his intention of prosecuting works of public emolument, they obtained a settlement under a parliamentary sanction in England, where they soon made a considerable number of proselytes, before their principles were fully discovered and explained.

Many ingenious treatises on metaphysics and morality appeared in the course of this period; and a philosophical spirit of enquiry diffused itself to the farthest extremities of the united kingdom. Tho' few discoveries of importance were made in medicine, yet that art was well understood in all its different branches; and many of its professors distinguished themselves in other provinces of literature. Besides the Medical Essays of London and Edinburgh, the physician's library was enriched with many useful modern productions; with the works of the classical Freind, the elegant Mead, the accurate Huxham, and the philosophical Pringle. The art of midwifery was elucidated by science, reduced to fixed principles, and almost wholly consigned into the hands of men practitioners. The researches of anatomy were prosecuted to some curious discoveries by the ingenuity and dexterity of a Hunter and a Monro. The numerous hospitals in London contributed to the improvement of surgery, which was brought to perfection under the auspices of a Cheselden and a Sharpe. The advantages of agriculture, which had long flourished in England, extended themselves gradually to the most remote and barren provinces of the island.

The respectable patriots that form the Society established at London, have already done considerable service to their country, and will, it is hoped, still do more: a considerable number of machines having already been sent them, in consequence of their large premiums and bounties.

The mechanic powers were well understood, and judiciously applied to many useful machines of necessity and convenience. The mechanical arts had attained to all that perfection which they were capable of acquiring; but the avarice and oppression of contractors, obliged the handicraftsman to exert his ingenuity, not in finishing his work well, but in affording it cheap; in purchasing bad materials, and performing his task in a hurry; in concealing flaws, substituting shew for solidity, and sacrificing reputation to the thirst of lucre. Thus many of the English manufactures, being found slight and unserviceable, grew into discredit abroad; thus the art of producing them more perfect, may in time be totally lost at home. The cloths now made in England, are inferior in texture and fabric to those which were manufactured in the beginning of the century; and the same judgment may be pronounced upon almost every article of hardware. The razors, knives, scissars, hatchets, swords, and other edge utensils, prepared for exportation, are generally ill-tempered, half-finished, flawed or brittle; and the musquets, which are sold for seven or eight shillings a-piece to the exporter, so carelessly and unconscientiously prepared, they cannot be used without imminent danger of mutilation; accordingly one hardly meets with a negro man upon the coast of Guinea, in the neighbourhood of the British settlements, who has not been wounded or maimed in some member by the bursting of the English fire-arms. The advantages of this traffic, carried on at the expence of character and humanity, will naturally cease whenever those Africans can be supplied more honestly by the traders of any other nation.

Genius in writings spontaneously arose, and though neglected by the great, flourished under the culture of a public which had pretensions to taste, and piqued itself on encouraging literary merit.

Among the poets of this æra may be numbered John Philips, author of a didactic poem called Cyder, a performance of real merit, though the author lived and died in obscurity: William Congreve, celebrated for his comedies, which are not so famous for strength of character and power of humour, as for wit, elegance and regularity: Vanburgh, who wrote with more nature and fire, though with less art and precision: Steele, who in his comedies successfully engrafted modern characters on the antient drama: Farquhar, who drew his pictures from fancy rather than from nature, and whose chief merit consists in the agreeable pertness and vivacity of his dialogues: Addison, who was excelled by none in the character of an essayist, either for style or matter: Swift, whose muse seems to have been mere misanthropy. He was a Cynic rather than a poet; and his natural dryness and sarcastic severity would have been displeasing, had not he qualified them by adopting the extravagant humour of Lucian and Rabelais: Prior, lively, familiar and amusing: Rowe, solemn, florid, and declamatory: Dryden, elegant, nervous, and entertaining: Pope, the prince of Lyric poetry, unrivalled in satire, ethics, and polished versification: the agreeable Parnel; the wild, the witty, and the whimsical Garth: Gay, whose fables may vie with those of Le Fontaine, in nature, humour, ease, and simplicity; and whose genius for pastoral was truly original. Young long survived a venerable monument of poetical talent. Thomson, the poet of the Seasons, displayed a luxuriandy of genius in describing the beauties of nature. Akenfide and Armstrong excelled in didactic poetry. Even the Epopœa did not disdain an English dress, but appeared to advantage in the Leonidas of Glover, and the Epigoniad of Wilkie. The public acknowledged a considerable share of dramatic merit in the tragedies of Young, Mallet, Home, and some other less distinguished authors. Besides these, great merit appeared in the detached performances of Johnson, Mason, Gray, the two Whiteheads, and the two Wartons, besides a great number of other bards who have sported in lyric poetry, and acquired the applause of their fellow citizens.

Dr. Atterbury and Dr. Clark distinguished themselves in divinity: and Newton shone unrivalled in philosophy. John Locke, the great restorer of human reason, may be said to have invented metaphysics, as Newton invented physics. Berkley, afterwards bishop of Cloyne, surpassed all his contemporaries in subtlety of reasoning and deduction.

Candidates for literary fame appeared even in the higher sphere of life, embellished by the nervous stile, superior sense, and extensive erudition of a Corke; by the delicate taste, the polished muse, and tender feelings of a Lyttleton. King shone unrivalled in Roman eloquence. Even the female sex distinguished themselves by their taste and ingenuity. Miss Carter rivalled the celebrated Dacier in learning and critical knowledge; and Mrs. Lennox signalized herself by many successful efforts of genius, both in poetry and prose. The genius of Cervantes was transfused into the novels of Fielding, who painted the characters, and ridiculed the follies of life with equal strength, humour, and propriety. The field of history and biography was cultivated by many writers of ability, among whom we distinguish the copious Guthrie, the circumstantial Ralph, the laborious Carte, the learned and elegant Robertson, the ingenious and penetrating Smollet, the comprehensive and philosophical Hume. Nor let us forget the merit conspicuous in Campbell, remarkable for candour, intelligence, and precision. Johnson, inferior to none in philosophy, philology, poetry, and classical learning, stands foremost as an essayist, justly admired for the dignity, strength, and variety of his stile, as well as for the agreeable manner in which he investigates the human heart, tracing every interesting emotion, and opening all the sources of morality. The laudable aim of inlisting the passions on the side of virtue, was successfully pursued by Richardson, in his Pamela, Clarissa, and Grandison; a species of writing equally new and extraordinary, where, mingled with much superfluity and impertinence, we find a sublime system of ethics, and amazing knowledge, and command of human nature. Many of the Greek and Roman classics made their appearance in English translations, which were favourably received as works of merit; among these we place Homer by Pope, Lucan by Rowe, Virgil by Dryden, and another translation by Pitt and Warton, Horace by Francis, Polybius by Hampton, and Sophocles by Francklyn. The several wars introduced a variety of military treatises, chiefly translated from the French language; and a free country like Great Britain, will always abound with political tracts and lucubrations. Every literary production of merit calculated for amusement or instruction, that appeared in any country or language of Christendom, was immediately imported, and naturalized among the English people. Never was the pursuit after knowledge so universal, literary merit more regarded, than in this æra by the body of the British nation; but it was honoured by no attention from the throne, and little indulgence did it reap from the liberality of particular patrons. The reign of queen Anne was propitious to the fortunes of Swift and Pope, who lived in all the happy pride of independence. Young, sequestered from courts and preferment, possessed a moderate benefice in the country, employing his time in a conscientious discharge of his ecclesiastical functions. Thomson, with the most benevolent heart that ever warmed the human breast, maintained a perpetual war with the difficulties of a narrow fortune. He enjoyed a place in Chancery by the bounty of lord Talbot, of which he was divested by the succeeding chancellor. He afterwards enjoyed a small pension from Frederic, prince of Wales, which was withdrawn in the sequel. About two years before his death he obtained a comfortable place; but he did not live to taste the blessing of easy circumstances, and died in debt.

None of the rest, whom we have named, enjoyed any share of the royal bounty, except W. Whitehead, who succeeded to the place of laureat at the death of Cibber; and some of them, whose merit was the most universally acknowledged, remained exposed to all the storms of indigence, and all the stings of mortification.

While queen Caroline, consort to George II. lived, some countenance was given to learning. She conversed with Newton and Clarke, and corresponded with Leibnitz. She took pains to acquire popularity: the royal family, on certain days, dined in public for the satisfaction of the people: the court was animated with a freedom of spirit and vivacity, which rendered it at once brilliant and agreeable. At her death that spirit began to languish; and a total stagnation of gaiety and good humour ensued. It was succeeded by a sullen calm, an ungracious reserve, and a still rotation of inspid forms, during the sequel of her husband's reign.

England was not defective in other arts that embellish and amuse. Musick became a fashionable study, and its professors generally caressed by the public. An Italian opera was maintained at a great expence, and well supplied with foreign performers. Private concerts were instituted in every corner of the metropolis. The compositions of Handel were universally admired, and he himself lived in affluence. It must be owned at the same time, that Geminiani was neglected, though his genius commanded esteem and veneration. Among the few natives of England who distinguished themselves by their talents in this art, Purcell, Green, Howard,

Howard, Arne, and Boyce, were the most remarkable.

The British soil, which had hitherto been barren in the article of painting, now produced some artists of extraordinary merit. Hogarth excelled all the world in exhibiting the scenes of ordinary life; in humorous historical designs. Hudson, Reynolds, and Ramsay, distinguished themselves by their superior merit in portraits; a branch that was successfully cultivated by many other English painters. Wootton was famous for representing live animals in general; Seymour for race horses; Lambert, Wilson, and the Smiths, for landscapes; and Scot for sea pieces. Several spirited attempts were made on historical subjects; but little progress was made in the sublime parts of painting. Essays of this kind were discouraged by a false taste, founded upon a reprobation of British genius. The art of engraving was brought to perfection by Strange, and laudably practised by several other masters; and great improvements were made in mezzotinto, miniature, and enamel. Many fair monuments of sculpture or statuary were raised by Rysbrack, Roubilliac, and Wilton. Architecture, which had been cherished by the elegant taste of a Burlington, and a Wren, soon became a favourite study; and many magnificent edifices were reared in different parts of the kingdom. Ornaments were carved in wood, and moulded in stucco, with all the delicacy of execution; but a passion for novelty had introduced into gardening, building, and furniture, an absurd taste, equally void of beauty and convenience. Improvements in the liberal and useful arts, will doubtless be the consequence of that encouragement given to merit by the Society instituted for these purposes, which we have mentioned on another occasion. As for the Royal Society, it seems to have degenerated in its researches, and to have had very little share for half a century at least, in extending the influence of true philosophy.
